IN LOVING MEMORY

We, the wife and children of the late Herbert Barber Howe, publish this manuscript in loving memory of the author, exactly as we found it at the time of his death, May 2, 1957. The only significant change in the text is the addition of the names of a few descendants which were sent to the author during his last illness.

FOREWORD

The purpose of this study is twofold; to depict realistically four men who served in the armed forces during the Revolution and to outline their descendants, widespread and various.

Here is strange and far from conventional reading. The home ties of the fifth generation Middlesex County, Massachusetts, Puritans were disrupted, revealing its members, prior to the Lexington Alarm, resident in western Massachusetts, New York and New Hampshire. Yet, wherever they were, without taint of Loyalism, they served the cause of the United Colonies. One with his family endured the Wyoming Massacre. Three suffered at Valley Forge. Yorktown took the life of the third brother. After the conflict closed the survivors lived in western Massachusetts, New York—two on its frontier, another on Manhattan Island—and Vermont. Amid all these changes it was inevitable that blind spots should cloud the sources. But all the facts available have been used in the plain, unvarnished biographies.

Basic to every study of the family is Daniel Wait Howe's monumental genealogy. Appreciation for this invaluable work is unbounded. Since its publication, 1929, there has come to light much material not only carrying the list into the twelfth generation but also correcting errors. Nevertheless, the oldest daughter and the second son of the Revolutionary generation have only inadequate records of grandchildren and to date no living descendants are known. The only extant portrait is that of the youngest brother. Serious as are these shortcomings, it seems worthwhile to publish the information generously furnished by interested friends and history-conscious members of the family. To them, one and all, for their cooperation are due most sincere thanks.

THE WAYSIDE INN

To place the Four Howe Brothers among eighteenth century Massachusetts families only three words are required—The Wayside Inn. That landmark was well described in Longfellow's diary. "Drive with (James T.) Fields to the old Red Horse Tavern in Sudbury—alas no longer an inn. A lovely valley; the winding road shaded by grand old oaks before the house. A rambling, tumble down old building two hundred years old; and till now in the family of the Howes who have kept an inn for one hundred and seventy five years. In the old time it was a house of call for all travellers from Boston westward."

Then the poet immortalized the place in the Prelude of his Tales of the Wayside Inn

As ancient is this hostelry
As any in the land may be,
Built in the old colonial day,
When men lived in a grander way,
With ampler hospitality,

* * * * *

Remote among the wooded hills!
For there no noisy railway speeds,
Its torch-race scattering smoke and gleeds;
But noon and night, the panting teams
Stop under the great oaks, that throw
Tangles of light and shade below,
On roofs and doors and window-sills.
Across the road the barns display
Their lines of stalls, their mows of hay,
Through the wide doors the breezes blow,
The wattled cocks strut to and fro,
And, half effaced by rain and shine,
The Red Horse prances on the sign.

In 1692 Samuel Howe, great uncle of the Four Brothers, was recommended by one of Sudbury's Selectmen to have a license for the entertainment of travellers. "Our fathers came into this wilderness to enjoy the Gospel—in its purity and the conversion of the hethen but instead of converting them we have taught them to be druncherds." Apparently meeting the test, his descendants long controlled the Howe Tavern. His son, David Howe, built the original part of the structure soon to be known as the Red Horse Tavern. A Revolutionary officer, Col. Ezekiel Howe, became the next proprietor, followed by his son, Adams Howe, and he in turn by his son, Lyman Howe, the last of the family to entertain travellers, who died at the outbreak of the Civil War. Of him Longfellow wrote—

But first the Landlord will I trace:
Grace in his aspect and attire;
A man of ancient pedigree,
A Justice of the Peace was he,
Known in all Sudbury as "The Squire."
Proud was he of his name and race.

* * * * *

The scroll reads, "By the name of Howe."
And over this, no longer bright,
Though glimmering with a latent light,
Was hung the sword his grandsire bore
In the rebellious days of yore,
Down there at Concord in the fight.

FIRST GENERATION

1. John Howe born in England, settled in Sudbury, Massachusetts Bay Colony, 1638, married Mary - - - , removed to Marlborough 1657, died there 1680 and his widow in 1698.

Almost a century and a half before the firing of "the shot heard around the world" and over sixty years before Sudbury's tavern was built, the great-great grandfather of the Four Brothers, John Howe, came to the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Vague traditions mention Warwickshire as his birthplace and glover as his old world occupation. There is no confirmation of these claims, but in Massachusetts he was a successful pioneer. In 1638 he settled in Sudbury, was duly admitted freeman and probably married his wife there. Becoming a Selectman he was subsequently charged "to see the restraining of youth on the Lord's day."

Eighteen years later with others he petitioned the General Court for a grant of land "eight miles square—for to make us a Plantation." Thus was the Town of Marlborough established. As "the first white inhabitant" he served on the committee "to put the affairs of said new Plantation in an orderly way" and to establish a church. Again he became a Selectman. The Indians trusted "Goodman Howe" and in an involved land dispute the General Court, having confidence "in his honesty and sense of justice," appointed him an arbitrator. Opening Marlborough's first tavern in 1661, John Howe established the precedent for a long line of his descendants. Despite means of defense against King Philip and his aggrieved Indians, in which Howe had a prominent part, Marlborough was sacked and partially destroyed. "The 26th of March, 1676, being the day for public worship—the people assembled at the house where prayer was wont to be made—their spiritual leader, the Rev. Mr. William Brinsmade, commenced his sermon and was dispensing to them the word of life when he was interrupted by the appalling cry 'the Indians are upon us.' The assembly instantly broke up, and the people made for the neighboring garrison, where, with a single exception, they all arrived in safety." That same year at the Sudbury Fight the oldest son of the family, John Howe, Jr., lost his life.

This sad note is found in John Howe Senior's will, "John How my grandchild, son unto my son John How deceased, shall have an ew lamb, I having already done well for his father." That document made provision for his wife, Mary, and their eight surviving children—twelve had been born to them. To Thomas Howe, his eighth child, he bequeathed "my now dwelling house, and all my Out-houses with all the land lying about the same—together with my Town rights and priviledges belonging to my houselot—all my right in fort meadow, the

His estate was inventoried for £511—a large sum for a pioneer settler to accumulate. John and Mary Howe established deep roots which have held a large number of their descendants in the Marlborough area to the present day.

In 1899 a descendant, Daniel Wait Howe, published "The Puritan Republic" with this gracious dedication—

SECOND GENERATION

9. Thomas Howe born in Sudbury 22 July 1656, married (1) 8 June 1681 Sarah Hosmer who died in 1724, married (2) 24 Dec. 1724 Widow Mary Barron who died in 1741. He died in Marlborough 16 Feb. 1733.

Thomas Howe, the great grandfather of the Four Brothers, remembered so handsomely in his father's will and entrusted with the care of his widowed mother, soon received from her a deed for six acres of land "in consideration of the natural motherly love and affection I bear to my well beloved son."

His maintenance of the family inn was regulated by a rather drastic bond providing, among other things, "he shall not sell any wine to the Indians, or negroes, nor suffer any children or servant, or other person to remain in his house, tippling or drinking after nine o'clock in the night—nor shall he entertain any persons of jolly conversation or given to tippling." But he evidently became too strenuous in promoting business and was duly summoned by warrant and admonished by Peter Bulkley Esquire "for ye breach of ye law in selling 1 qt Cider to the Indians." Also in opposition to the authorities he objected to the settlement of the Rev. John Emerson as local pastor and later took an active part against the tyrannical governor, Sir Edmund Andros. Nevertheless Thomas Howe held public offices galore—among others Selectman, Town Treasurer, Representative in the General Court, one of the King's Justices of the Peace and Colonel in the militia.

As an Indian fighter he was outstanding, "he not only commanded the garrisons and scouts through the town but led the troops to every place of danger which presented itself." In 1704, with a hastily gathered force, he marched seventy miles through an infested area to the relief of Northampton. Three years later he defeated the Indians at what is now Sterling.

He became a proprietor of the newly laid out Town of Leicester where, as we shall learn, a certain grandson settled. His land transactions were on a large scale occupying thirty entries in the Middlesex County deeds. Sarah Hosmer, daughter of James and Sarah White Hosmer of Concord, he married as his first wife in 1681 and she became the mother of his three sons and three daughters. Towards the end of his life he deeded his second son, Jonathan Howe, "in consideration of love and good will," a certain parcel of land near his dwelling house "and so along to the place where my old saw mill stood between Assebeth River and Fort Meadow Brook, also 1/2 of my 33 acres beyond Boone Pond."

The Colonel's name and achievements have been used by those of his descendants seeking membership in the various colonial societies. Far and away the most prominent of the early generations, he deserves recognition as the first of this branch of the family to command troops. Queen Anne's War in America had no more devoted leader. His military heritage was followed and enlarged by the Four Brothers.

THIRD GENERATION

15. Jonathan Howe, born in Marlborough 23 Apr. 1687, married 5 Apr. 1711 Lydia Brigham. He died in Marlborough 22 June 1738; the record of his widow's death is lacking, probably about 1760.

The grandfather of the Four Brothers was Jonathan Howe, "yeoman of Marlborough" and a very successful one. Taking full advantage of the prosperous careers of his father and grandfather, yet at the same time avoiding innkeeping and abstaining from public office, he devoted himself to large scale farming. Moreover the times were with him for it was an interlude between the wars. The Glorious Revolution in England had brought William and Mary to the throne and the overthrow of Governor Andros offered a good future to the colony. All of these facts, combined with his good judgment, enabled Jonathan Howe in his home town to rank as a very prosperous husbandman and extensive land owner.

In 1711 when he was twenty four years old, he married into one of the best Marlborough families. Lydia Brigham, three years his junior, was the daughter of Captain Samuel and Elizabeth Howe Brigham. Nine children—four sons and five daughters—were born to the couple and all but two lived to maturity. His wife's father had won his military title by serving with his friend, Colonel Thomas Howe, against the Indians in Queen Anne's War. Captain Brigham had also represented Marlborough in the General Court at Boston. But most important of all his achievements was the introduction of tanning and shoe making—his tannery was established in 1700—whereby the traditional farming of that area was supplemented by industry, the foundation of Marlborough's future. It was as a cordwainer that we shall hear of one of his grandsons. For both families the Howe-Brigham alliance was most fortunate.

Jonathan Howe's will, 1738, is a most interesting document: "I hope my Soul (returns) to god that gave it throug faith In Christ my onely Redemer for his sak I hope to receive the pardon of all my sins—touching the Disposal of my parsonel and Real Estate as it hath god to bestow it upon me—I give unto my Well Beloved Wife Lidia all my Houseelstuf within Dores to her Disposal for Ever and I allso give unto her three Cows such as she shall Cheuse—and six Sheep—and My Riding Mare—I give unto Lidia my beloved Wife and My oldest son Timothy How my homsted and mansion House and all my Land In Marlborough abovesaid and all my seder Swamps that Lie In westborough In the county of Worcester—I give to my Son Bezeliel How three hundred pounds in Current Bills of Credet or Lawfull selver money of New England—I give to each of my sons that is to Bezeliel Charles and Eliakim a pare of steares and a Cow—out of the stock of Cattel that I Leve—." His estate inventoried at £2,016, way and above the accumulations of his forbears and proof positive of his business acumen.

His widow used the spacious family homestead for the relief of a daughter-in-law and her children in their tragic years of need as we shall learn. But right here in anticipation we must record that one of the Four Brothers, her grandsons, revealed a deep appreciation of that assistance in bestowing this grandmother's maiden name on his only son. Also it is to be noted that Brigham Howe, despite the lapse of years and in a distant place, was worthy of that honored name. Such continuity is an outstanding memorial of the Marlborough grandparents.

FOURTH GENERATION

21. Bezaleel Howe, born in Marlborough 19 June 1717, married c1738 Anna Foster-Wilkins. He died in Leicester Nov. 1750; his widow's death was after 1781, probably about 1790.

The father of the Four Brothers, was the first of the family to bear the unusual Biblical name found in the books of Exodus, Chronicles and Ezra. Yet the formal decorum of his Puritan ancestors seemed not to his liking for he followed unconventional ways. As a youthful leader of a group he baited the authorities and stood trial at Cambridge for "Riot, Rout, Trespass or tumultuous Disorder." While this arrest may be written off as unimportant it seemed to be a very disturbing factor with this family and may be of importance conditioning his future reputation. True, there had appeared a certain instability within the Puritan Holy Commonwealth due to the expansion of the colony northward and westward. Church relationship, once so important, does not appear in any form in his record. But within his short life time he was identified with three communities—Marlborough, Rutland and Leicester—and possibly with a fourth, Salem. Apparently to Bezaleel Howe prosperity was just around the corner. Evidence is quite insufficient to render a final judgment but, at least, his was a pattern strange to the ways trodden by his forebears.

Over against these suspicions of unsteadiness must be set his 1739 marriage into a prominent Salem family, meriting praise. This statement is fully justified because for long years his wife's name has been a moot point. He was said to have married "Anna" or "Anna Foster" and there has been no mention of her background. By implication was augmented his alleged irresponsibility in marrying an unknown. The reverse is the truth. Anna Foster, born in Salem and baptized there 3 April 1715, was the daughter of Ebenezer Foster and Anna Wilkins. After Foster's death in 1721, when their daughter was five years old, his widow married her cousin, Isaac Wilkins. Sometimes the daughter was known under her step-father's name with confusion resulting. The mother was Anna Wilkins Foster Wilkins and the daughter Anna Foster-Wilkins, two names almost identical and easily misapplied. Moreover the maternal grandparents of Anna Foster were Benjamin and Priscilla Baxter Wilkins. Both the Baxter and Wilkins families bulk large in Salem's history. This marriage of Bezaleel Howe into the Foster-Wilkins-Baxter family was as noteworthy as the marriage of his parents.

Bezaleel and Anna Howe made their first home in Marlborough, his family's center for three generations. His three brothers and three sisters were there and a host of relatives. He was a well known cordwainer, following the trade his Grandfather Brigham introduced by opening the first tannery in 1700. Forty years later Bezaleel Howe was in position to capitalize on this background and become a prosperous citizen. Socially the community was auspicious with a welcome to the twenty-five year old bride from Salem. The future seemed bright, especially as within the next seven years four children were born to the couple. Susannah Howe was named for her mother's half sister, the only child of Isaac and Anna Wilkins Foster Wilkins. When their first son was born in 1742, his uncle Timothy Howe—co-owner with his mother of the family homestead—had died and the baby was given his name. The next two children, Edith and Darius, bore cognomens of their parents' own choice not to be found in the Howe, Foster, or Wilkins families.

By that time his home town seemed to pall on Bezaleel Howe. He sought other fields of opportunity. Possibly Rutland, over in Worcester County, offered less competition in the making of shoes, but the move there is shrouded in mystery. In this new home their third son, Baxter Howe, was born. He was given the name of his Salem great grandmother, Priscilla Baxter Wilkins, clear evidence of his mother's pride in her family background. Interesting it is to find, as has been mentioned, that this child was to conserve the custom of family appellation. Moreover, through the years his family, as the genealogical section will show, has conserved that valued tradition of honored names.

But such tradition, at least as regards place of residence, seemed to have had little appeal to the cordwainer. Tiring of Rutland, unable to settle down, Bezaleel Howe took his wife and five children back to Marlborough within a year. It is very probable that in this home town interval of slightly more than a year the family from Rutland stayed with Bezaleel Howe's mother in her "mansion house," thereby anticipating a late move by Anna Howe, to be mentioned. In due course another Worcester County community, Leicester, of which Colonel Thomas Howe was an original proprietor, was chosen for residence by Bezaleel and Anna Howe. He had purchased land there a few years before—100 acres with an adequate house from John Snow for £320 Old Tenor. Leicester in 1750 was far from an unknown place for the Howes. There lived Bezaleel's older sister, Prudence, who had married her cousin, Isaac Howe. Also prominent in Leicester was another cousin, Paul Howe, and his family. He was a Selectman of the town and in the forefront of its affairs. Here, again, was a bright future for the Bezaleel Howes and doubtless a good and growing place for trade. The land, on the site of the present Paxton, was fertile and the house ready for their use. But suddenly this project also failed, for at the age of thirty-three years Bezaleel Howe died in the early autumn of 1750.

FOURTH GENERATION

He had not made a will and the Proprietors with apparently unbecoming haste seized all of the deceased man's land to satisfy the mortgage. But, as will be seen, only about a third of the acreage was necessary to balance the account. The Widow Anna and her children, in age from ten to two years, were in a precarious position. But what of their relationships to leaders in the community? Was there a hesitancy to befriend the dispossessed family in its bereavement? We do not have the answers, but at the very least the situation has a suspicious look. Even if Howe's reputation was that of a rolling stone, he was possessed of more than enough land to meet his debts, and it seems as if his widow could have been given residence in her home long enough for her baby's birth and to plan the future.

Whatever the cause of this seeming and cruel estrangement, Anna Howe with her five children returned the twenty miles or more to Marlborough and to the protection of her mother-in-law's home. There Anna's sixth child, a son named for his father, was born 28 November 1750. Circumstances being as they were, he was not baptized for eight months. In her endeavor to straighten out her husband's affairs the widow had Hezekiah Raymond of Marlborough, whose wife was Tabitha Howe, another cousin of Bezaleel's, named administrator of the estate. Its inventory totalled £145, an amount woefully insufficient to support the mother and her six children—the Four Brothers and their two sisters. Her husband's mother in her sixtieth year with her large home became the mainstay of this displaced family.

Then, from the town authorities of Marlborough, came an ominous decree. Apparently the municipal poor fund was deemed in danger because of the presence of the family group from Leicester. On 10 December 1751 the Middlesex Court of General Sessions permitted the Selectmen of the Town of Marlborough "to enter their caution against Anna How, relict widow of Bezaleel How, and her daughter Susannah How. The said Selectmen refusing to admit them as inhabitants of this town they having been warned to depart as per Warrant and Return there on file." The situation was tragic in the extreme. In his home town, among many relatives as well as the friends of his father and mother, Bezaleel Howe's family was unwanted. In some way his generous mother stood sponsor—possibly she signed a bond and procured other relatives as co-signers—for the expenses of the "warned" family while they lived in her "mansion House." At least the authorities accepted the group as inhabitants of Marlborough for the time being. It is noteworthy that one of the Four Brothers, although then only a child, never forgot his grandmother's efforts for their well being. Long years afterwards he named his only son "Brigham" in appreciation. A most gracious act, shedding a volume of light on those discouraging days in Marlborough.

By 1759 the compromise with the Town fathers had run its course. The home in Marlborough was no longer possible. Probably the grandmother had died in her 69th year. At any rate a major shift came to this displaced family. On April 4 the oldest daughter, Susannah, had married William Wood of Westboro. Timothy Howe in his 18th year enlisted in the British Army. Darius Howe was about to join a group of emigrants to Berkshire County. The two younger sons—Baxter and Bezaleel, Jr.—were transferred by their mother's petition to the Probate Court, to the guardianship of their uncle, Eliakim Howe of Marlborough, younger brother of their father, and removed with him to Henniker, New Hampshire, a frontier town, in June 1763. This action of the Widow Anna Howe laid the foundation of an estrangement as will be told. Then the mother, left with only her sixteen year old daughter, Edith Howe, to provide for, went to Middleton in Essex County. Here, in a town closely related to Salem, lived Anna Howe's mother and several families of Wilkins relatives. At last she was among her own and freed both from the threat of Marlborough's warning and also from dependence on her husband's family. In Middleton she and Edith enjoyed comfort and happiness. After they had spent four years in this place and the daughter was twenty years old, there was celebrated a marriage very gratifying to all parties concerned. On 29 May 1764 Edith Howe and Timothy Bradford, were married. The bridegroom was the son of Captain Samuel and Mary Taylor Bradford, Salem born people, who were prospering in Middleton.

Meanwhile efforts were being made to settle Bezaleel Howe's estate. On 18 October 1764 Hezekiah Maynard, administrator, asked permission of the General Court "to seel the whole of said deceased's real estate." This was granted two weeks later with this proviso, "The interest of $\frac{1}{3}$ of the money arising from the sale to be applied to the support of Anna How, widow of Bezaleel How, in lieu of dower." The Leicester real estate of "Bezaleel How, cordwainer and yeoman," less 38 acres "taken by execution by the Proprietors" was sold to "Oliver Witt of Leicester Gentleman." In other words 62 acres found a purchaser some fifteen long years after Howe's death. But finally his widow had some return in the settlement of the estate. In addition to this money—the amount is unknown—Anna Howe also received a legacy from her mother who died at sixty-eight years of age and whose will was probated 28 June 1773. This date was erroneously entered in the History of Marlborough as the widow Anna Howe's death—another instance of the confusion resulting from the almost similar names of mother and daughter. Thus little by little life became easier for the widow—even though she was not to see three of her children again—thanks to her presence with her loyal family in Middleton.

After two children had been born to Timothy and Edith Howe Bradford, they removed with his parents, his brother and his wife's mother to Hillsborough, New Hampshire, in 1766. That town, resettled after its destruction by the Indians, found good leadership in the Bradford and Wilkins families. It was incorporated in 1772 with Samuel Bradford and Timothy Wilkins among the petitioners. Timothy Wilkins had settled there in 1764 and Samuel Bradford arrived two years later. The latter built the first saw and grist mill, opened an inn of which we shall hear more later. Both men signed the petition for the incorporation of Hillsborough. Captain Samuel Bradford organized a company of militia which trained the local men for the impending conflict. Timothy Bradford's original Hillsborough land was purchased in the fourteenth year of His Majesty's Reign, 9 May 1774. The deed involved the transfer of 110 acres from "John Wilkins of Amherst gentleman"—a relative of his wife—to "Timothy Bradford gentleman of Hillsborough" in the County of Hillsboro and Province of New Hampshire. The price was £75 and the boundaries included a couple of beech trees, a yellow birch, a hemlock and a stake and stones, being the same tract Wilkins had purchased "of William Williams by deed dated the Eighth day of January A D 1773." Fourteen conveyances to and from Bradford mark his residence in Hillsborough and confirm his prominence and success. The three Bradfords and Nehemiah Wilkins served on the committee to call the Rev. Jonathan Barnes "to take charge and oversight of the church and flock of Christ in this town"—a committee to be mentioned again. This family leadership in Hillsborough rejoiced the heart of Widow Anna Howe, giving her the feeling of security lacking in the days of her peripatetic husband.

Although her three oldest children lived elsewhere, she had with her Edith Bradford, Baxter and Bezaleel, Jr. These younger sons, after their Henniker experiences, were glad to be on their own again. Apparently their uncle, Eliakim Howe, had been a hard taskmaster, giving them bed and board but little else except hard work. Bezaleel, Jr., frequently recalled in after years that in the decade with his guardian he had only known a single term of school attendance and that "By stealth." Most unfortunately this statement contained a deeper significance than his very obvious deficiencies in penmanship and spelling. He resented being taken, as a young boy, away from his family and "farmed out" as it seemed to him. This feeling evidently strained the bond of affection between mother and son as will be seen. Nevertheless the reunion of the Widow Howe with her three children and their life together in Hillsborough brought comfort to all concerned. It explains in part the statement in the Family Genealogy—long a stumbling block—“Bezaleel Howe’s widow and children afterwards removed (from Marlborough) to Hillsborough.” But that change of residence did not include the two older of the Four Brothers and their sister, Susannah, none of whom ever lived in that New Hampshire town. Furthermore, the statement omits mention of the seven years Anna Howe and her daughter lived in Middleton and the longer period that the younger sons were in Henniker. Yet for a part of the family Hillsborough offered much in the years immediately preceding the outbreak of the Revolution.

With that event came another and thoroughgoing breakup. The two Howe brothers enlisted in the American army. Captain Bradford, after his useful community leadership, died in 1776 “respected by all who knew him.” Not until 1781 did the Widow Howe see her youngest son again and then under most trying circumstances. As a lieutenant in the First New Hampshire Regiment, Bezaleel Howe, Jr., was sent back to that state on recruiting service. He visited his mother and sister, after six years’ absence, and left this ghastly report. “They caught me around the neck and feel to weeping. They kept it up for so long that I told them if they did not stop, I would go away and never come back.” Evidently this thirty-one year old officer was contrasting their extreme emotion with the bitter memories of his boyhood. His feeling ran away with him and petulantly he appeared in a most unfilial mood. Carrying out his threat he left the town and never saw his mother again. After the close of the war the Timothy Bradfords moved to Tunbridge, Vermont, and Edith Bradford’s mother, about 75 years old, may have accompanied them. We lack any further mention of Anna Foster-Wilkins Howe.

Incidentally, Bezaleel and Anna Howe’s four sons and two daughters were not conditioned by their insecure childhood. Their offspring born between 1765 and 1815, a period of forty years, were many—Susannah had seven; Timothy, fifteen; Edith, eleven; Darius, nine; Baxter, two; and Bezaleel Howe, Jr., nine—a total of fifty-three grandchildren!

Here in a few paragraphs has been outlined the family background of these men who served in the American Army during the Revolution. Three generations were Puritan settlers and builders. Then appear the enigmatic parents. The father’s restless and checkered career and the mother’s frustration, unable or unwilling to make a home for her children, do not add up to a success story or, it is feared, a very happy one. All this is passing strange in the light of the united and devout families from which both husband and wife were descended. Yet, notwithstanding all their shortcomings, they someway or somehow passed on to their sons a certain sense of responsibility. In after years this trait was revealed in varying ways and in distant places by the Four Howe Brothers.

29. Timothy Howe, the oldest son of Bezaleel and Anna, born at Marlborough, Massachusetts, 6 October 1742, lived his allotted three score years and ten among three colonies. Prior to his eighth birthday he shared his father's wanderings, finally reaching Leicester. Then following his father's decease he returned with his widowed mother to his birthplace and was sheltered in his Grandmother Howe's homestead until his seventeenth year. On the dispersal of his family, as we have noted, he moved westward. In the Hudson-Champlain valley he either enlisted as a British soldier or accompanied the army, possibly as a teamster, in a civilian capacity. To date no formal record of his enlistment either from Massachusetts or New York has been found. But the Seven Years War had begun with William Pitt determined to drive the French from Canada. This victory crusade, not unlike the work of another great Prime Minister in our own time, swept young Howe with hundreds of other colonials into Sir William Abercrombie's army before the defeat at Fort Ticonderoga in 1758. Although lacking mention of the unit in which the Massachusetts youth served, we have his two stories as clear evidence of his participation. The first concerned George Augustus Lord Howe, a division commander and a most popular officer. "Hearing that there was a man of his name among the forces, Lord Howe sent for my father to come to his tent," wrote his son in after years. "Lord Howe inquired as to the youth's lineage and ancestry. My father related all he knew about his family and Lord Howe declared they were akin." A small incident in itself (and quite as indefinite as Timothy's great-great grandfather's alleged place of birth) but treasured by the man to whom it was told and often repeated to his children. Possibly it was not emphasized in the years when Lord Howe's two brothers were the commanders of the forces sent by England to overcome the Americans.

In General Abercrombie's disastrous defeat by General Montcalm, Lord Howe lost his life, 6 July 1758. The next year the Colony of Massachusetts Bay erected a monument in Westminster Abbey "in testimony of the sense they had of Lord Howe's services and military virtues, and of the affection their officers and soldiers bore to his command." That affection was fully shared by Timothy Howe. His next assignment is unknown but probably he served under Lord Jeffrey Amherst who, promptly reversing his predecessor's failure, captured both Fort Ticonderoga and Crown Point; then pushing down the lake gained Montreal for the British. This action followed General Wolfe's capture of Quebec. The Prime Minister's unlimited war in America was successful. From some place in that final campaign, Timothy Howe had another reminiscence. From an old Frenchman who had been at Oswego when it returned to English hands in 1759, he learned of an alleged treasure buried in the well at Fort Ontario. Repeatedly told to his children, it finally inspired Timothy Howe's son to visit Oswego in a vain endeavor to locate the French loot. Evidently Howe had the ability to tell of these experiences with vividness and these surviving reminiscences demand our credence.

After the surrender of Canada to the British, Timothy Howe settled at Stillwater, New York, about sixty miles south of Ticonderoga. Evidently the valley he had known in war appealed to him as a good place to live. At Stillwater he met and married Elizabeth Andrus who was to prove the heroine of the family, but most unfortunately her family background is unknown. Apparently her father, Titus Andrus, lived with the Howes. On 27 June 1765, twin sons, Timothy, Jr., and Titus, of whose Revolutionary army experiences we shall hear later, were born to the couple. Living among Yorkers, a more diversified and less tradition bound people, appealed to this Yankee-born man. He seemed uninterested in his ancestral Massachusetts. Possibly he remembered the harsh warning served on his mother as well as the rigid control of affairs enjoyed by formal and established New England Church. At any rate, as a typical come-outer, Timothy Howe, Sr., became a Baptist and before long a lay-preacher in that church. Such was his reaction to his Puritan forbears. Nevertheless he was the only one of the Four Brothers to name a child Anna after his mother—a significant fact at contrast to the attitude of at least one of his brothers, as we have read. But there is no record of Timothy Howe's ever mentioning his mother in any way. Clearly we are dealing with a broken family. The somewhat thorough-going schismatic, as a small farmer and preacher, eked out his support of his growing family—three daughters had been added to the circle—in Stillwater for about seven years.

Then in 1772 came a complete change of base noted in the family records by this laconic sentence. "His father-in-law, himself and all he had moved to Wyoming on the Susquehanna River." No reason is so much as hinted for the three adults and five young children taking this radical step. Was he following the pattern of his peripatetic father? Had his newly formed religious affiliation opened the vision of an ideal community which the town on the highway between New York and Montreal, with vivid memories of battles, did not satisfy? Possibly he thought Wyoming, hallowed by the one-time presence of Count Zinzendorf and a center of the Moravians (Howe knew their missionaries on the New York frontier), offered opportunity for the conversion of the Indians. Whatever the reason, the elder Andrus and the Howes, probably joining a group from the valley, laboriously journeyed to the outpost community in Pennsylvania.

The new home, strange as it may seem, was the farthest attainment under Connecticut's ambitious and ambiguous charter to lands "from the Atlantic and western sea and ocean on the east part to the south sea on the west part." In other words, a tract measuring approximately sixty miles wide and three thousand miles long! Promoted by the Susquehanna Company chartered by Connecticut, the Wyoming area was subsequently named the Town of Westmoreland and annexed to Litchfield County. With non-resident enthusiasm the Scotch poet, Thomas Campbell, in "Gertrude of Wyoming," sang—

Delightful Wyoming! beneath thy skies
The happy shepherd swains have naught to do
But feed their flocks on green declivities

If any small portion of that unreal atmosphere appealed to the former soldier, Timothy Howe, he was to be sadly disillusioned. Connecticut's western claim had been resisted with arms by Pennsylvania in the Pennymite and Yankee wars and furthermore just as soon as the Revolution began its course, the Tories at Fort Niagara looked with longing eyes on "the green heart of Pennsylvania" along the Susquehanna frontier. But of course those facts were unknown to Howe on his hopeful but arduous journey southward. Down the Hudson valley, roads, such as they were, carried the immigrants as far as the Delaware Water Gap, but from there across the mountains to Wyoming ran only wilderness trails. No feat of the imagination is required to picture the difficulties of that company of men, women, and children plodding on their long trek to their new home.

At the time of their arrival on the Susquehanna River "a dream of happiness lulled the settlers into the repose of absolute security." It was the best of all possible places in the minds of the New York group. Even certain of the inhabitants were Baptists, and, under Wyoming's democratic rule, were freed from taxation for the maintenance of the established New England Church. Beginnings of civilization were evident in a grist mill, a school and a local militia. Forty Fort in the local district known as Kingston was becoming a reality. So far Timothy Howe and his family seem to have attained utopia. But the outbreak of war with the Mother Country drew off the able bodied men for the Continental Army. Wyoming was poorly defended. After Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga, the Tory leaders on Lake Ontario, Johnson and Butler, determined on a campaign of revenge at the expense of Connecticut's most western outpost.

Let Howe's reminiscences as told to his son describe the infiltration by Tory sympathizers as a preliminary to a most sinister development. "About a year and a half before the terrible tragedy (of 1778) there came a poor and destitute couple to the settlement. There was no house where the man and his family could be accommodated and he sought help of my father on the ground of his being a Baptist, in pity to a destitute brother my father took them in his own house, although at great inconvenience, and kept the family through the winter. Then they went 60 or 70 miles up the Susquehanna River. The following spring this man in a canoe returned to the settlement and said his family were in a starving condition. The settlers remonstrated with the man for remaining in those perilous with them, so far from his family surrounded by Indians. The man said he would go back to his family if the settlers would furnish him what was needful for present necessities. The settlers then furnished him liberally with food and clothing and he went back up the Susquehanna to his family. He returned no more to the settlement until with (Colonel John) Butler and his savage Indians and Tories he came to murder the inhabitants and destroy the settlement. His pious wife returned with him."

From Fort Niagara on Lake Ontario came a force of about 1200 Rangers, Royal Greens and Iroquois under Colonel John Butler. These invaders easily captured Wyoming's outlying forts. The settlers, driven out of their homes, anxiously took refuge in Forty Fort. There the forty-seven year old Colonel Zebulon Butler, who had been in Abercrombie's army at Ticonderoga, at the capture of Havana and finally in the Continental Army, was in command. Six companies of militia—the 24th Connecticut Regiment—mostly old men and boys, for the able bodied were in New Jersey with General Washington—constituted his available force, although he was continually hoping for reinforcements from the east. The commander refused a demand to surrender and called a council of war. Many of his senior officers counseled delay, but the majority of the men, keenly conscious that the enemy had been three days in the town "carrying on their work of conquest and murder" destroying the valley piecemeal, urged that they be led to action, saying, "We must depend on God and ourselves." In consequence of this opinion, in the early afternoon of 3 July 1778, the force, three hundred strong, marched from the fort to drive out the invaders. Zebulon Butler told his soldiers that they were fighting not only for liberty but for life itself and "what is dearer to preserve our homes from conflagration, our women and children from the tomahawk." As the militia slowly advanced, their fire forced the British center to give ground. But after half an hour the Indians "with horrid yells" completely outflanked the defenders. Their defeat by overpowering numbers was thoroughgoing. Every militia captain at the head of his men was slain. The survivors fell back to Forty Fort and the terror stricken women and children gathered there. Let Timothy Howe's reminiscences continue the story.

"My father was First Lieutenant (sic) of a company under Captain (Dethick) Hewitt who was slain with his company except nine men. One of these was my father who escaped the general slaughter as by a miracle and returned to the fort about midnight. The next day (July 4th) a flag of truce came to the fort to demand its surrender unconditionally. The bearers of the flag were prisoners (of the enemy) whose families were held as hostages to secure their return. Colonel (Nathan) Denison and my father, the only surviving officers in the fort, went out to meet the enemy's officers. The two Americans soon learned the terms, and my father understood that no favor would be shown to any who were in the engagement of the previous day. So he immediately returned to the fort and gathered those of his company (who had escaped from the battlefield) and with some provisions hastily thrown into a skow, that lay near the fort, shoved down the river with might and main, and escaped leaving the women and children, my mother with her seven children among the rest, to the mercies of the Indians."

The utter frankness of this appalling and shocking statement is evidence of its truth. Conditions were desperate; it was every man for himself. The result of fear and panic were in the ascendency. Fortunately for the children, Elizabeth Andrus Howe had nerves of iron and determined purpose—a heroine for whom words of praise are at best weak and inadequate. The popular mystery stories of the present pall in intensity when compared with the achievement of this woman.

"The Indians and their more savage friends, the Tories, took possession of the fort so soon after the departure of the skow that they (the escaping men) heard the Indians' whoops of delight and their firing. On the way down the Susquehanna, my father hailed Colonel Zebulon Butler (the commander of the militia on July 3rd) who lived on the bank of the river to appraise him of his danger, who, immediately mounted horse, took his wife on behind him, and fled. - - - I cannot recollect though my father related to me his adventures after leaving the fort. I can give no further account of him for two years."

Matters in the fort, obviously related by Elizabeth Andrus Howe, concern the attempted escape of Benjamin Shoemaker, one of the earliest settlers and a friend of the family, and also of her own experiences, sufferings and flight with her seven children ranging in age from the thirteen year old twins to a daughter barely two years old. After the surrender and the escape of the fugitives in the skow, "Mr. Shoemaker had taken to the river, being an expert swimmer, and hoped to escape to some place of concealment. He was discovered and hailed by the man (the once destitute person already mentioned). I have forgotten the villain's name but let it perish! (His name was Windecker according to the Wyoming history.) This villain invited Shoemaker to come on shore. 'I dare not,' replied Shoemaker, 'for you will kill me.' 'I will not,' said the wretch, 'I am your friend and will protect you.' By his persuasion he (Windecker) induced Shoemaker to come on shore. Extending his left hand as if to aid him, the villain with his right hand knocked Shoemaker on the head with a tomahawk and shoved his body back in the river. The next day the body of Shoemaker was seen floating alongside the fort."

"In the meantime the villain's wife came to my poor mother who stood weeping with her children near the few articles of necessity she had hastily brought into the fort. 'Sister Howe,' said the woman, 'I'm going to do just as I've a mind to, and if you know what is good for yourself you won't open your mouth.' The woman without further preliminaries took from my mother's bundles whatever she chose. This was the return my mother received from the woman so much indebted to her. Yet, apparently, in spite of their hard heartedness, this Tory couple with compassion or shame exerted themselves on behalf of my mother and her children and secured for them from the Indians the mark of life which was red. For the enemy no sooner entered the fort than they began to affix the stigma of life or death on all their captives. But some of the children not understanding the red marks on their faces washed them off. Some Indians discovering this were very angry, and having affixed the mark a second time, told the children that if they washed it off again, they would be killed. Now commenced the plundering but those who wish to make themselves acquainted with the tragic scenes may receive ample information from Colonel Stone's Life of Joseph Brant.

FIFTH GENERATION

“Amid the bustle and confusion that followed in the fort, mother and her children passed out the gate and sauntered about as if they knew not what to do. At length they got to the woods and perceiving that they were beyond observation from the fort, those who were capable took the smaller children on their backs or in their arms and with utmost speed made their way through the wilderness. The sun was about two hours high when they commenced their flight and they travelled until dark, when hungry and weary they crouched upon the bare ground in the midst of the wilderness and spent the night. In the morning they arose with the light and proceeded on their way. For three days they found no habitation or human beings except a few like themselves escaping for their lives. They had no food but a few berries they found in the forest. Then they came to an abandoned log hut but found little there to sustain their famished bodies. They proceeded onward (across the Pocono Mountains to the Delaware Water Gap) fording the Delaware River at Minisink (soon to be destroyed by Joseph Brandt and his Indians) and entered into Orange County, New York. They subsequently got over (ferrying the Hudson at Poughkeepsie) into what was called the Great Nine Partners tract in Dutchess County at Tower Hill.”

On this journey were the children, Timothy, Jr., and Titus, age thirteen, Elizabeth, Lucy, Anna and the younger children born in Wyoming. Their names are of great interest—Darius, four years old, named for his father's younger brother then in the Continental Army, and Lydia, age two, named for the Marlborough grandmother who had befriended Timothy Howe together with his brothers and sisters in the tragic days we have read about. Evidently the Susquehanna settlement, far from Massachusetts, developed tender memories of the past. It is also noteworthy that we have details of the lives of these Pennsylvania born children, descendants of Lydia, having contributed much to the family records. But first and foremost in this escape from Wyoming was the heroic mother, Elizabeth Andrus Howe. Her two hundred mile journey on foot with the young children amid precarious conditions—retracing much of the ground she had hopefully travelled six years previously—was an accomplishment superb, meriting a high place in the annals of the Revolution. Her deed is without parallel in the family's long history.

In the course of time Timothy Howe, although his return route and experiences are unknown, rejoined his wife and their children at Tower Hill. One report says that he joined the army, another declares that he had “some employment in the public service” but neither statement finds confirmation in the official records. Whatever his occupation he was absent in Boston on the most tragic day, 14 July 1780, when his wife gave birth to their eighth child, Bezaleel Howe, 3rd, and died within a few hours. She lies in some cemetery along the road over Tower Hill in the southwestern part of the Town of Amenia, near the boundary line of the Town of Washington (then known as Filkington) and not far from Wassaic on the present route 22. Her grave is unmarked and unknown—one of the most undeserving and sad facts in the annals of the Howe family, but in appreciation of her heroism her name has been given to many of her descendants.

The reminiscences we have been following add this note concerning the eight children alone in the home. "We can hardly conceive a more forlorn condition than that in which we were all placed, not a relative, paternal or maternal, to whom we could apply for counsel or aid. We were all thrown upon public charity. The neighbors were very kind and took the smaller children until they could be provided for. On the third day after my birth I was conveyed to Benjamin Fowler's house - - ." Many details of his life are given. "No child could have been treated more kindly," by the foster parents with whom Bezaleel Howe, 3rd, remained until he became of age. It must be remembered that this eighth child who never lived in his father's home is the one to whom we are indebted for the invaluable reminiscences, quoted at length, describing the life of Timothy Howe.

He was the only one of the Four Brothers to have had sons serving in the Revolutionary forces. In April 1782 the two oldest twin sons, Timothy, Jr., and Titus, in their eighteenth year, enlisted at Tower Hill in the New York Levies. These militia units "in which the period of service was usually eight months or less, were designated as for the defense of the frontiers. They were rarely gathered together as regiments but garrisoned frontier forts and blockhouses in small detachments." Pension applications, 1833—Timothy, Jr., then at Livonia, Livingston County, and Titus at Hinsdale, Cattaraugus County—describe their army services. They were assigned to Colonel Weissenfels regiment—Timothy, Jr., in Captain John White's company and Titus under Captain Paulding—at the rendezvous in Fishkill. Then they moved up river to Esopus. They both served as waiters or personal servants to officers. Timothy, Jr., was stationed at Marbletown, Pin Pack, Orangetown and Clarkstown, while Titus spent the time of his service at Churchland back of Esopus. "There were no battles fought by the corps to which these deponents belonged while they remained with it nor did any other occurrence transpire of importance." Furthermore Timothy, Jr., received a furlough after seven months and was joined at Tower Hill by Titus a few weeks later. We may call their frontier duty quite minor to their parents' experiences on the Susquehanna and to their uncles' war services, to be described in subsequent chapters. But we must remember that they were on duty in the last year of the war when the enemy, quite conscious of Yorktown's significance, hesitated to take the initiative. Also significant is the fact that each of these men in his sixty-eighth year received a pension of thirty dollars per annum, evidencing the nation's appreciation for the stand-by services of the young sons of a veteran.

The latter part of Timothy Howe's life can be summarized in a few sentences. Following the loss of his wife and his return to the home on Tower Hill, he was then forty years old, the care of his seven children proved too onerous a burden. Hence on 14 April 1782, while the two oldest sons were in the militia, the widower was married by the Rev. Ephraim Bullock, veteran pastor of the First Baptist Stanford Church in Bangall, Dutchess County, to Zipporah (Zeprea) Cash. Her age and her parents' names are unknown. All we know is that her family name was a familiar one in the Towns of Stanford and Washington. Seven children were born to the couple but we have only a list of their names without dates or marriages. Thus by his two wives Timothy Howe's offspring numbered fifteen—the largest group of any of the Four Brothers.

By the time the 1790 census was taken Timothy Howe and his second wife had moved to Canajoharie on the Mohawk River. We know about a few of Elizabeth Andrus Howe's children. Timothy, Jr., married Elsie (Elcy) Howe and lived in Northeast, Dutchess County, and his neighbor was his twin brother, Titus. Bezaleel, 3rd, and Huldah Cheeseborough of Berne, Albany County, were married in 1800. His care in preparing the traditions, recounted by his father, we have found invaluable and a descendant has also been most helpful. Lydia, the two year old who was saved by her mother from Wyoming, married, 1802, Robert Davis, a prominent Albany merchant, and much information has come from their great grandson. Still another of the children of Timothy and Elizabeth Andrus Howe was Darius, also born on the Susquehanna, married to Sophia - - - and living in Cayuga County. Interesting it is to find from his 1820 will that he called himself Darius Andrus Howe, thereby remembering his mother's heroic name.

The last word we have about Timothy Howe came from Bezaleel, 3rd, who visited his father in Montgomery County some time in 1802. Again the son heard of the buried treasure at Oswego. Evidently the older man was something of a raconteur for, after over forty years, he described the location of the fort's well in such an appealing and accurate way that the twenty-two year old son determined to find the French gold. Taking his brother-in-law, Ovid Cheeseborough, as companion, he set out from Canajoharie, visited his brother Darius in Scipio and then journeyed north to Oswego. It was all in vain for the fort had been completely changed and the well covered up so that the much talked about loot was never found. As a teller of tales about his varied experiences under two flags, we have our last glimpse of Timothy Howe.

As a young man he was a participant in the war winning the continent for the British Empire. Then engaging as an American militiaman, he defended a western outpost against the Loyalists. From the victorious enemy his rather ominous escape was at sharp contrast with his wife's fearless guidance of their children through the forest to safety. His brothers, as we shall learn, took part in the punitive expedition reversing the Wyoming defeat and reopening the western lands to American settlers. Finally, with sons in the militia defending the New York frontier, the restless career of the Puritan born farmer, preacher, soldier and patriot swung full circle. Only a colorful piece of historical fiction can do justice to the oldest of the Four Brothers.

31. The second son of Bezaleel and Anna Howe, Darius, was also born in Marlborough, the ancestral home of the family, on 26 June 1746. A child of four when his father died at Leicester, he was brought back by his mother to his birthplace and enjoyed the comfort and security of the Jonathan and Lydia Brigham Howe "homsted and Mansion house" until the break-up of the group in 1759-1760. Then for another year or more he stayed with relatives of which there were very many or with friends in his native town. In his sixteenth year the way opened for him to go with neighbors into the western part of the colony. Truly the lines were fallen unto him in pleasant places quite different from his older brother, Timothy, living in another colony among strangers. This migration to Berkshire County, typical of the expansion in those times, requires a word of explanation for it was an integral part of Marlborough's history.

A decade prior to Darius Howe's birth, the General Court granted a large tract of land, part of it designated as Township #2, to seventy-two proprietors. They were mostly Marlborough men and their meeting place was the Howe Tavern of which we have heard, established by John Howe the pioneer and maintained by his descendants. In its spacious common room these enthusiastic expansionists laid out a new community on paper, sought to interest purchasers and to secure migrants. Land speculation was the order of the day. Cheap undeveloped land appealed to the pocketbooks and to the imaginations of the restless successors of the pioneers. First of all, about 1744, Benjamin Wheeler, a respected citizen anxious and ready for new fields of endeavor, became the original settler in New Marlboro. Its name reflects the influence of the older community's ambition. Nehemiah Howe, a cousin of Darius, built the first grist mill in the western community and marrying Beulah Wheeler, a daughter of the first settler, constructed one of the earliest comfortable homes in the new town. Noah Church acquired land in the Berkshire Hills district but for a while continued to live in Marlborough. These men and the other proprietors devoted themselves to the undertaking with one of their chief accomplishments, of course, the organization of the church. As minister they called the Rev. Thomas Strong, Yale 1740, "equally removed from levity and austerity" with a salary of £50 per annum. It was a happy choice, for Mr. Strong was to serve as the spiritual leader of New Marlboro for thirty-three years. With settlers coming in, a good preacher secured, the future was bright with promise with the incorporation of the town in 1759.

About 1761 Noah and Lydia Church with their eleven children, all born in Marlborough, migrated to New Marlboro. With them went the fifteen year old Darius Howe, for the Howes and the Churches had long been friends. Young Howe helped David Church, a youth of his own age, with the building of the house and the clearing of the fields. Maybe the new village school saw something of these boys, but probably it was a good deal like Henniker with Darius's younger brother—so much hard work that there was little time for anything else. In the Church family were seven daughters and it was not long before Louise, their sixth child, and Darius Howe were greatly enjoying each other's society. The young man found plenty of opportunity for getting ahead and soon acquired land of his own. This asset transformed the boy immigrant of only ten years before into a citizen of standing. To assume the duties of a householder was the next step and it was not difficult as the young lady was willing and ready to assist him. On 11 July 1771 the Rev. Thomas Strong united in marriage Darius Howe and Louise Church—the groom was twenty-four and the bride nineteen. This alliance brought Howe into the forefront of community affairs as his wife's father was most prominent in town leadership. It was Noah Church, quite in advance of many of his neighbors, who was keenly conscious of the differences developing between the Mother Country and the Colony. In the organization of the local Committee of Correspondence no one did more than he. When we read in the County History that New Marlboro became "one of the most thoroughly efficient in the patriotic cause of the towns of Berkshire County," we must give the credit to Noah Church.

Befitting the son-in-law of a patriotic leader, the cause of the Colony's rights engaged young Howe's full attention. He was one of the earliest to enroll in the local train band and soon was a full-fledged Minuteman. Just prior to his enlistment his son, Darius Howe, Jr., was born and family affairs were more propitious than ever. But all such sentiments in New Marlboro were destined to speedy disruption—just as we shall find in Hillsborough with Darius's two younger brothers. On 21 April 1775, two days after the Lexington Alarm and almost exactly the same date that Baxter Howe entered the armed forces, Darius Howe, as a private soldier, marched to Cambridge in Colonel John Fellow's regiment of Berkshire County men. It was war in earnest with the Massachusetts Provincial Congress hopefully voting, "an army of 30,000 be immediately raised and established." The thirteen years at New Marlboro were ended. On the mother's shoulders alone was left the care of the growing family—Darius, Jr., had a brother Winslow and in a few months there arrived another son who received the name of his soldier uncle, Baxter Howe. Six years with the army was to be the lot of Darius Howe, Sr.

For the balance of 1775 the regiment had 539 men in the fortifications at Roxbury. Then their daily ration was a pound of beef and another of pork, 2 pounds of bread, $\frac{1}{4}$ pound of rice and peas, $\frac{1}{9}$ pound of butter and 2 pints of beer. A far better diet than they were to enjoy in subsequent years. In 1776 he transferred to the 12th Massachusetts, Colonel Samuel Brewer commanding, and fought at Long Island where both of his younger brothers were engaged. In 1777 Darius Howe became a corporal and then a quartermaster sergeant. The rank of ensign was given him two years later and he was promoted to a lieutenancy 14 October 1780. With his brothers he suffered in the terrible winter of 1777-78 at Valley Forge and all three of the Howe Brothers fought on the battlefield of Monmouth in the blazing sun. Apparently his regiment was not in the Sullivan-Clinton expedition against the Iroquois in western New York which revenged the loss his older brother had suffered at Wyoming. But he heard many tales of the good land in the Finger Lakes area and he longed to settle in that paradise. On New Year's Day of 1781 he was transferred to Colonel Joseph Vose's 1st Massachusetts regiment. In six years Darius Howe had risen from the ranks and was a commissioned officer in the Continental Army. The future was bright with the prospect of further promotions. Then came the mystery of his military career—resignation from the service on 14 May 1781, exactly a week before Generals Washington and Rochambeau planned their allied campaign resulting in Lord Cornwallis's surrender.

Why did he leave the army seven months to a day after being made a lieutenant? The spring of 1781 does not seem a propitious time for closing a successful military career. The answer does not lie in the realm of public affairs, for although there were acute financial troubles and occasional mutinies, the national cause was no more desperate than it had been many times previously. Moreover it was common knowledge that the Commander-in-Chief was planning the next campaign with the help of the superbly equipped French army already camped in Rhode Island. On the horizon were signs of hope. The withdrawal of the Massachusetts officer was an in-and-out affair. Apparently both Howe and the army command expected his return. Here is the very strange and complicated paragraph from official documents which would not have been made had the resignation been final. "Darius Howe reported furloughed for 60 days 15 Jan. 1781, reported on command at Berkshire, Massachusetts, February-April 1781, reported on furlough at New Marlboro, absent 101 days from Captain Timothy Remick's company of Colonel Vose's 1st regiment muster roll for May 1781 at White Plains, reported resigned 14 May, reported in return of effectives 1st regiment 27 December 1782, reported on furlough in Massachusetts in return of effectives at New Windsor 3 January 1783, reported on furlough by leave of General Gates 21 February 1783."

His resignation, clearly a matter which both the lieutenant and the army hoped to overcome, was based on family reasons. Noah Church at New Marlboro, the center of the family group, was in his seventieth year and no longer able to discharge his responsibilities. Louise Church Howe with her children needed the presence of her husband. Darius Howe's severance from the army was as simple as that and however much he may have desired to continue his military responsibility his family responsibilities outweighed all other considerations. He never resumed his position in the regiment. Nevertheless we cannot forget that only five more months of service would have made him a participant in the Siege of Yorktown alongside of his two younger brothers. But by that time he had become the sole support of his family at New Marlboro.

In his seventy-eighth year, 7 March 1789, Noah Church died at his New Marlboro home. He was one of the last of the proprietors who had used the Howe Tavern in Marlborough as a center for planning the Berkshire County town. In that community, foreseeing and ardently supporting the Revolution, he had been represented in the army by his sons and by his son-in-law, Darius Howe. Now this younger generation were free to leave the rocky acres of their home town for the more fertile land they had heard about. The veterans of General Sullivan's army, including the two younger brothers of Darius Howe, had popularized the land they fought over, gaining many New England families for its settlement. Among them were Darius and Louise Howe with their nine children. When their youngest son, bearing his grandfather's name, Noah Church Howe, was seven years old, they all set out for the Finger Lakes area and settled at Scipio.

There near Owasco Lake the first deed we have found shows Lt. Howe purchasing five acres, part of Military Lot 79, from Nathan Cash—probably a relative of Timothy Howe's second wife. Eighty dollars bought this land lying west of Mill Creek on 9 August 1803. Undoubtedly his farm land was either rented or unrecorded for this purchase was his home site. The extent of the land boom in the area is evidenced by Howe's sale of this same property on 4 May 1805, less than two years after he acquired it. To Jonathan Richmond was sold the land for two hundred dollars. One hundred and fifty per cent was not a bad increment for the veteran. But there is a tragic note in the document. Louise Howe was not a party to the transfer and the omission of her name indicates her death before her fifty-fifth year. She had been his playmate in the former days at Marlborough, his wife for almost four decades, and the mother of his children. The sixty year old widower was bereft indeed. He removed to nearby Sempronius where he purchased fifty acres along the west line of Military Lot 81 from Daniel and Polly Brinsmade. This property cost him two hundred and fifty dollars on 9 March 1813. Five years later Darius Howe changed his residence to the Town of Brutus a few miles south on the shore of Cayuga Lake. Now in his seventy-first year, hearing that Revolutionary soldiers were being well treated by the government, he filed the following application.

State of New York, Cayuga County. Darius Howe of the Town of Brutus & County of Cayuga aforesaid being duly sworn deposeth & saith that in the year 1775 he enlisted under Cap. Sole (Moses Soul) in Colonel Fellows Regiment in the Massachusetts line of minute men & served till June 1776. In February 1777 he enlisted during the war under Cap. Stone of Lenox in Col. Samuel Brewers Regiment in Genl Patersons Brigade & served till May 15, 1781 when he was discharged at New Windsor in New York, which discharge is on his Lieutenants Warrant not now in his possession. This deponent further saith that he was appointed & made an Ensign while in the service in Colonel Ebenezer Sprouts Regiment, his Warrant is dated Nov. 26, 1779: which said Regiment was the 12th in the Massachusetts line as by the Warrant inclosed will appear. And then in 1781 he was made a Lieutenant in the first Massachusetts Regiment but did not get a Commission as he was discharged before it came on. And further than his ensign's commission is now at Leroy in Genesee County. And he further saith that by reason of reduced circumstances he is in need of assistance from his country for support.

Darius Howe

As a result he was ascribed on the Roll of New York at the rate of Twenty Dollars per month to commence on the 15th of April 1818. The certificate is endorsed—

Arrears to 4th Sept 1818	93.33
Semi-annual allowance ending 4th Mar 1819	120.00
	$213.33

This aid must have been a god-send to the aging man and contrasts rather sharply with the pension given his nephews in Dutchess County for their militia services. Certainly Darius Howe's war record, as far as it went, was of the best.

Evidently the children of Darius and Louise Howe had migrated from the Scipio area to the western part of the state. Note the reference above to Le Roy in Genesee County but to whom it refers we are ignorant. About 1825 the youngest child, Noah Church Howe, took his father to Covington in that same county. There in the son's home the former Lieutenant was cared for until his death in his ninetieth year, 23 February 1837. Aside from that fact clouds cover the records. We have not been able to locate his grave or to find any reference to his son in the community transferred to Wyoming County when it was organized in 1841.

In this sixty-second year, 1854, Noah Church Howe, the son of an officer in the Revolution, made application for a pension. We do not know the result but judging by the refusal of aid to his cousin, Margaretta Howe Dupignac 82, daughter of Lieutenant Bezaleel, we are inclined to believe it was disallowed. But as this somewhat odd and rambling document contains some family information we also quote it in full.

State of New York, Wyoming County—On this 22nd day of June 1854 appeared before me, Charles B. Benedict, a Justice of the Peace of said County, Noah C. Howe, a resident of the Town of Covington in the County and State aforesaid, aged sixty years, who—doth on his oath make the following declaration in order to obtain the benefit of the Act of Congress passed June 7th 1832 and also the Act of May 15th 1828 and all other acts of Congress granting Pensions to Officers and Soldiers who served in the Revolutionary War and to their Widows and Children. That he is the Child and Only Son and the only Child and Son (surviving) of Darius Howe and Louise Church Howe He further declares that the said Darius Howe was married to the said Louise Church before the war closed as he has been informed and believes. He further declares that the said Darius Howe died on the 23rd of February 1837 at the Town of Covington, Genesee County, New York. He further declares that the said Darius Howe served as a Commissary in the Revolutionary War six years and as a Lieutenant one year to the close of the War and his children drew and received bounty land for his said services not far from the year 1834. He further declares that the said Darius Howe--was a Revolutionary pensioner at the rate of $240. per annum till he died under and by virtue of the Act of Congress passed 18th March 1818 and for the proof of his said serving the declarant--refers the Commissioner of Pensions to the papers proofs and document now on file in the Pension Office on which his claim for said pension was granted and also on which the said claim for Bounty Land was granted. He further declares that he is over the age of twenty one years and that he (Darius Howe) left no widow surviving him. He further declares that he makes this declaration to obtain an increase of pension under the acts aforesaid to which his father, Darius Howe, was entitled and which he never received in his life time and the declarant says that no person has applied for nor received such increase to his knowledge. He (Darius Howe) was paid at the Albany Agency. The declarant cannot tell nor does he know when and where the said Darius Howe entered and left the Service nor under whom he served nor in what Corps or Regiment but refers to said papers for these facts.

Noah C. Howe

This application attested by Moulton Farnham and R. H. Farnham of LeRoy, Genesee County, New York

Darius Howe's life is typical of many Revolutionary veterans. With six years of good service attested by promotions it was terminated just as victory was to crown the efforts of the Americans. Family concerns were predominate. To our generation this action was individualistic to the core, but we must remember that there was absolutely no government provision for the care of dependents, even the soldiers' pay was often a minus quantity, and we can find many precedents for his resignation. Typical also was the transformation of a good Yankee into a citizen of the Finger Lakes district of New York with its good soil. Had his wife lived, we believe we would know of his children, probably their descendants are in the Middle West. Despite everything this second of the Four Howe Brothers, in a much more conventional way than Timothy, was also one of the many men to whom America owes its independence.

32. Baxter Howe, the third son of Bezaleel and Anna Howe, born at Rutland, Massachusetts, 29 August 1748, was the only one of the Four Brothers whose birthplace was other than the family center at Marlborough. His father's restlessness had taken the family to the Worcester County community where the boy spent his first year. Then back to Marlborough for the next year, in 1750 to Leicester, another Worcester County town, and finally in his fourth year his widowed mother took him back again to Marlborough. There at his grandmother's home he remained until he was nine years old. Transferred to the care of his uncle, Eliakim Howe, whom Anna Howe had the court appoint as guardian for her two younger sons, Baxter spent twelve years. Four of these were also in Marlborough and the balance in Henniker, a newly settled New Hampshire community, to which his uncle removed in 1763. In that northern town Eliakim Howe was the second settler and built the first frame house. The Captain was most prominent in town affairs, subsequently taking a strong position in favor of "The United American Colonies," zealous in ridding the place of Tory sympathizers and hostile to the settlement of the Shakers and others who were not members of the established New England Church. He was intensely patriotic, not very liberally minded and a hard taskmaster.

Under his direction there was plenty of hard work and little time for schooling for his nephews, almost the same ages as his two older sons, Otis and Tilly Howe. His younger nephew with a shade of bitter disappointment told of only one term in school, owing to the multiplicity of chores assigned them by Eliakim Howe. Boys were the pioneer's chief asset. In 1769 the guardianship had run its course as Baxter Howe was of age and he removed to Hillsborough where his mother, with his sister, Edith Howe Bradford, and her family, following their seven years' sojourn in Middleton, had settled. It was a happy reunion after Baxter's rather peripatetic existence during his youth. His father's early death and his mother's apparent desire to shift from her shoulders the care of her younger sons may have embittered his younger brother, as we shall see, but did not irritate Baxter Howe. Apparently he was a hard worker, intelligent in learning how to perform the tasks assigned him, surprisingly able in maintaining his poise and taking all these varied experiences in his stride.

In Hillsborough he was to experience six successful and happy years. With the Bradfords, father and two sons, the younger of whom was Baxter's brother-in-law, young Howe formed a close alliance. The same was also true of his Wilkins cousins. All these men worked together in developing the community. When the church was seeking a pastor, Baxter Howe was also on the committee as a representative of the congregation. His signature is on the call to the Rev. Jonathan Barnes. That document has some unique features. The annual stipend was fixed at £30 "Lawful money by way of Settlement—for the first fore years—and furthermore we will allow him two or three Sabbaths a year to visit his friends." As the town grew in size, the salary increased "after their is 110 famelies in town it is to be sixty pounds thirteen shillings and fore pence anerely so long as he shall continue in the ministry among us." In other words the minister for his own advantage was to be the advance agent of the settlement using his free Sundays to proclaim the advantages of Hillsborough as a place of residence. Then the inn, established by Captain Bradford, was in due course placed in charge of "Mr. Baxter Howe, innholder." At his tavern the 1774 town meeting was held with much discussion about "impowering the Committee Chosen (Timothy Wilkins was a member) for Carrying on the work of the Meeting House to sell the pew ground except one for Mr barns (the pastor) and Dispose of the Ekefts towards finishing the House." It was a knotty problem and two special town meetings had to be called on the same question but without a decision as "ominous signs and indications predicted the coming of an earnest struggle the real depth and breadth of which no man could foresee." No clearer sentence as to the impending war could have been worded.

But the innholder was not especially dismayed, for while the protracted discussions were taking place, 22 September 1773, he married Levina Taylor, daughter of Ezra and Abigail Trowbridge Taylor, of Southboro, Massachusetts. The groom was twenty-five and the bride two years younger. At the same time Captain Bradford was drilling the Hillsborough men in anticipation of trouble. Baxter Howe was among these Minutemen and carefully learned the rudiments of soldiering. On 24 November 1774 a son was born to Baxter and Levina Howe. This happy event brought the bestowal of a significant name on the child. He was called Brigham in appreciation of the help of his great grandmother, Lydia Brigham Howe of Marlborough, whose house was opened, as we have seen, to the displaced and suffering family of the widow and her six children. A gracious remembrance of aid and comfort rendered a quarter of a century before the lad's birth. But the name carries even more value, for Baxter bore the appellation of his own great grandmother, Priscilla Baxter of Salem, and now in turn his son was to be likewise distinguished. Family tradition, even in the midst of rumors of war, was not to be disturbed. The newly made parents revealed a delicate feeling of responsibility and esteem for the past.

Yet the clamors of the living present became real with the Lexington Alarm of 19 April 1775. Immediately Baxter Howe took his wife and their six months old son to the Taylor home in Southboro. A thoughtful act, for Levina had only been in Hillsboro about two years and her husband felt that she would be more comfortable with her mother during his absence. The move, wiser than anyone could then predict, enabled her to have the best of care in her subsequent fatal illness and provided their son with a home during all the war years and until he reached the age of twelve years. But those events were all in the future. Of immediate concern was Baxter Howe's enlistment in Captain Josiah Fay's company of Colonel Jonathan Ward's 32nd Massachusetts regiment within ten days of the affair on Lexington's Green. At almost the same time Bezaleel Howe joined a group of recruits to the seat of war and Darius Howe left his home and family marching with his regiment to Cambridge. The disruption of war had laid its heavy hand on all three of these brothers.

Baxter Howe's army service is well documented. With others he signed a request for advance pay on 13 June 1775, on August 1st he was made a sergeant, he was in camp on Winter Hill, near Cambridge, in October. Two months later, came sad news from Southboro. On 13 December 1775, Levina Taylor Howe had died at her mother's home leaving her son, Brigham, a little more than a year old. It was a hard blow for Sergeant Howe, still further changing the course of his life and ending his dreams of reestablishing his Hillsborough home. But with stoical fortitude, his son being in his grandmother's loving and competent hands, he continued with the army. Eight months after his enlistment and a short five months from being promoted sergeant, he transferred to the 21st Continental Infantry. Then came the value of his pre-war training under Captain Bradford, for although under bereavement, this intelligent man forged ahead rapidly. No sooner was he transferred to the newly organized regiment than he was commissioned Second Lieutenant on 1 January 1776. Six months later he was promoted to a first lieutenancy. No one of his brothers attained commissions in such a short time. His participation in the action at Bunker Hill may have won him his second promotion.

Following the Siege of Boston he accompanied his regiment on the long march to New York City. The place could not be defended against the overwhelming enemy forces, for General Washington lacked both men and equipment. Those were anxious days. Finally in August 1776 the Americans attempted a stand on Long Island—both Darius and Bezaleel Howe were with their brother in the action. Baxter Howe's regiment, seeking to turn the tide of British advance, through either excessive bravery or the failure of the high command, lost many men as prisoners. Among these on 27 August 1776 was young Howe, but he either escaped or obtained prompt exchange for, as we shall hear, he rejoined his regiment in the final months of that year. In the meantime we find the name of "Lt Baxter Howe" on the Hillsborough tax roll with Bradford and Wilkins relatives. His community was proud of their twenty-eight year old representative in Washington's army. It is surprising that the New Hampshire records do not reveal any land purchase by him. Possibly his holdings may have been on a cooperative basis with his brother-in-law and, due to army service, reverted to Timothy Bradford. At any rate after that 1776 notation Baxter Howe, committed to a military career, lost identity with his home town. Important events in distant states were in the making for this former innholder.

After sharing in the discouraging retreat through New Jersey and participating in the surprise attack on Trenton, shared by his youngest brother, who has an interesting reminiscence to be duly related, Baxter Howe was again transferred to a different branch of the service in a newly organized regiment. It was Colonel John Lamb's Second Continental Artillery expanded from the battery led by its commander in the Quebec campaign of dire omen. Nothing daunted by suffering and defeat, the newly commissioned colonel proceeded to recruit his regiment and obtain the most efficient men available for officer personnel. Among those chosen was the lieutenant of infantry, Baxter Howe, on 1 January 1777. His selection was a great distinction. Popularity with his men, intelligence in handling them, and his bravery in action had not only won him two promotions within six months but also made him a marked man for the new unit. He was to continue his good record in the artillery. After the Battle of Princeton he was stationed at Morristown and from there marched to the defence of Philadelphia, when Sir William Howe, forgetting his colleague advancing up the Champlain Valley, moved his army south to Chesapeake Bay. Sharing in the defeats of Brandywine and Germantown, Baxter Howe, with his brothers, Darius and Bezaleel, faced discouragement for their cause.

FIFTH GENERATION

All three suffered together again at Valley Forge in that terrific winter of 1777-1778 of which the youngest brother has left a most sad story. Yet experiences at that camp are lighted by General Steuben's inspection and training of the troops together with the enthusiastic reception of the news concerning the French alliance. So with some hope in their hearts the army crossed the Delaware into New Jersey and met Sir Henry Clinton's force at Monmouth. On that hottest June day of 1778, despite General Charles Lee's disobedience of orders, the Americans did much harm to the British and to their commander's morale. Lt. Baxter Howe distinguished himself in that action and accordingly won, 7 November 1778, his final promotion as Captain-Lieutenant of the Second Continental Artillery. In the interval between the battle and his promotion he was encamped at White Plains, New York, and at several New Jersey sites including Middlebrook.

In that town, the present Bound Brook, during 1779, General Washington's headquarters were at the John Wallace house—now a museum and within the present bounds of Somerville. The various regiments, including Colonel Lamb's artillery, were better provisioned and clothed than ever before as well as more or less comfortably huddled in the vicinity. The one blot on the escutcheon, causing great anxiety at headquarters, was the enemy's campaign in the south. In July General Wayne's brilliant and daring victory at Stony Point brought temporary relief but the total picture was clouded and the Commander-in-Chief hesitant to make a move. The British-held New York City was the crux of the problem for the Americans were unable to attack Manhattan Island. Refugees from there, hoping to be enabled to return to their homes, were living in the area surrounding the Middlebrook Camp. Among these displaced families was John Moone and his daughter Mary. The young lady and Captain-Lieutenant Howe met at one of the neighborhood social gatherings which meant much to the officers and men of the army. The couple, each was thirty-three years old, became good friends and quickly an engagement took place. Equally quickly, for no one knew what the future had in store, they were married by the Rev. Mr. Grauff on 15 May 1779. A very interesting feature of the romance was that the guests at their wedding breakfast included a large group of officers with General Washington himself at the head. With his compatriots the groom's popularity was manifest, and the newly married couple began their life with the good wishes of prominent Americans. That ceremony at Bound Brook, in the midst of rather drab camp life, was a most outstanding event long remembered for its splendor.

Notes from Baxter Howe's war diary are the source of these statements. As late as the eighteen eighties this priceless document, together with his family Bible, was in the possession of his granddaughter, Mary Howe Givan Moore, the wife of George Henry Moore, long the librarian of the New York Historical Society and the first administrator of the Lenox Library. A search for the missing volumes, although negative to date, is still in progress. When they are found much light will be thrown on Howe's career. Family matters will be amplified and also, even more important, will be found this outstanding officer's comments on the course of the war in which he had been active since the Lexington Alarm.

Yet even wedding bells were drowned by the clamors of war. Hardly three months after his marriage Baxter Howe, with a detachment from his regiment, was ordered to join General James Clinton at Canajoharie. An important army move was in the making. At long last General Washington was determined to punish the Iroquois in western New York and thereby prevent raids on the frontier. Of the attack on Wyoming we have heard much in connection with Timothy Howe and his family. A similar tragedy at Cherry Valley was in everyone's mind. Now, by the orders of the Commander-in-Chief, the Indians and Tories operating from Fort Niagara were to suffer retribution. Down Otsego Lake and the east branch of the Susquehanna River Clinton's New York troops joined General Sullivan's forces, which had marched north from Easton, at Tioga, on 22 August 1779. In the latter command was Baxter's youngest brother, Bezaleel, recently promoted First Lieutenant. Thus began one of the great military movements in our history. "The army took up the line of its march into an unknown country, through leagues of unbroken forest, into the very heart of the enemy's territory, relying on its own valor alone for success, without hope of relief or reinforcements, or, in the case of defeat, of any quarter. An expedition—without scarcely a parallel—for the boldness of its design, and the courage with which it was undertaken. To transport an army with its equipment and supplies, through an uncivilized country without roads, for much of the way without water communication, to cut loose from their base—, to be shut up for weeks from the intelligence of the world, where to fall was to die, and ordinarily to die by torture, was an example of heroic bravery—." This was the situation faced by the two Howe brothers. On August 29th came the Battle of Newtown, near the present Elmira, with a victory in large part due to the Indians' fear of the cannon, "thunder trees" they called them, transported and manned by the strenuous exertions of Captain-Lieutenant Howe and his colleagues. Pushing northwestward the army, continuing its destruction of innumerable Indian villages with their crops of corn and fruit, progressed to a point south of Rochester. While plans for the capture of Fort Niagara did not materialize, terrible punishment was given the allies of the British. The successful campaign brought to the troops under Generals Sullivan and Clinton the heartfelt thanks of General Washington and of the Congress.

During almost the entire year of 1780 Baxter Howe was encamped at New Windsor with his wife living in one of the nearby Hudson River towns. Husband and wife were together again for some months. Washington's plans were in suspense due to unsolved problems. The war in the south where Nathaniel Greene had succeeded Horatio Gates as commander was a little more hopeful. But on the other hand was a mutiny at Morristown, and Arnold's treason cast dark and deep shadows. Although 5,000 French soldiers had landed in Rhode Island, the enemy fleet controlled that coast. In this complicated situation Baxter Howe, despite the presence of his wife, was at a low ebb. On December tenth he wrote, over the heads of the camp supply officers, to the Board of War asking for a suit of clothes "on account of my necessitous condition"—a realistic comment on the failure of routine army administration. No wonder the Commander-in-Chief, beset with problems before and behind, was limited in action. The cause of independence seemed practically at a standstill. But a couple of months after his doleful note to the authorities, happiness and joy came to Baxter Howe. His high spirits, in the midst of that discouraging year, brightened the horizon. Elizabeth Howe was born 27 February 1781. She was his second child. Safe and secure was the seven year old boy, Brigham, with his grandmother in Southboro and not far from the camp lived the baby girl and her mother. For the moment the family ties predominated with military anxieties relegated to second place. All kinds of complications gave way to this glorious interlude.

Then came Howe's last campaign. Determined to break the stalemate created by Sir Henry Clinton in New York and the Marquess Cornwallis in Virginia, Washington determined to send detachments from his army to the south. To that command was appointed the thirty-four year old Marquis de Lafayette. April 1781 found him with 1200 men on the march to Virginia "thirty miles sometimes a day." Supporting this column went others under Generals Steuben and Wayne. With the latter officer went an advance detachment from Colonel Lamb's artillery regiment including Captain-Lieutenant Howe's battery. In June, Wayne reached the Old Dominion to find conditions far from promising. The traitorous Arnold had been assisting Cornwallis to his great advantage. The enemy had almost complete control of the area. Without sufficient strength, even with his combined forces, to make an all-out attack, Lafayette was obliged to play a hit-and-run game. "He hovered in the neighborhood of the British, changing his position almost daily—continually hanging on the enemy's rear." An officer said, "We fight, get beat, rise and fight again." These tactics were not unlike certain underground activities of the recent war. Pushed almost to the limit of endurance by this ceaseless activity, Lafayette's men nevertheless were able to harass the British mercilessly. Although of superior strength the enemy, in desperation seizing Yorktown and Gloucester, established a fortified camp for protection against the American gadflies. Then, 31 July 1781, went Lafayette's famous dispatch to the Commander-in-Chief, "should a French fleet now come in Hampton Roads the British army would, I think be ours."

The Virginia campaign ranks high in the annals of the Revolution but the cost was enormous. Lafayette under great handicaps had performed a magnificent service. General Greene's actions to the south were useful but unspectacular. His endless marching and countermarching with the use of inadequate camp sites—often in swamps—had worn down his men. Food was neither adequate nor of the best quality and the water was frequently contaminated. All this was bad enough at best, but when it was imposed on soldiers largely from the north the different and strange climate was doubly hazardous. Fevers of all kinds were rampant among the officers and men. For over three months of strenuous activity as an efficient officer, Baxter Howe had maintained his health and spirits. But weakened by over-exertions and poor nourishment, he fell victim to disease. Its ravages destroyed his power of resistance. At Ethton on the James River below Williamsburg—sometimes referred to as Burwell's Ferry and at other times as Newport News—he succumbed to fever on 20 September 1781. In an unmarked grave lies the only one of the Four Brothers to make the supreme sacrifice.

Eighteen days after Captain-Lieutenant Howe's death, the Marquess Cornwallis surrendered his army to the Americans. Washington by infinite tact had brought about the union of the allied armies, marching post haste into Virginia, and through the cooperation of Admiral De Grasse's fleet was enabled to bring about the consummation of the campaign. It was a success that Howe had given his all to accomplish. Bezaleel Howe, arriving with Washington's forces, made inquiries for his brother, Baxter, and learned the sad news of his death. It was a heavy blow. The older and much respected brother had been his mentor from the days at Henniker and frequently, as at Valley Forge, they had met during the war. Amid all the rejoicing at victory, Bezaleel Howe carried a heavy heart. The ravages of war had taken from the family a very able member. His honored name was borne by three nephews—the sons of Timothy, of Darius, and of their sister, Edith Howe Bradford—and by three others of subsequent generations. A most fitting tribute to Captain-Lieutenant Baxter Howe.

After the evacuation by the British we find Mary Moone Howe and her daughter, Elizabeth, returning to New York City, the widow's native place. The 1793 city directory gives her address as the corner of Nassau Street and Maiden Lane. In the meantime as administratrix she had taken title to the thousand acres of bounty land which had come to her husband as an officer of the 2nd Continental Artillery, a New York regiment. This acreage in the Military Tract of central New York comprised Lots 46 and 62 within the Town of Cato, Cayuga County. She sold the property sometime in the late seventeen nineties. No pension was ever granted her although her husband died in the service. When her daughter was sixteen years of age, 1796, she married Nicholas Evertson, lawyer and Columbia College trustee and their descendants will be found in the Genealogical section. We have been unable to find subsequent city addresses for Mary Howe who died in her seventy-first year, 1819. All in all a sad commentary, for had Baxter Howe lived he would have taken rank in the new Republic.

We have spoken of his son by his first marriage, living with his maternal grandmother, Abigail Trowbridge Taylor, in Southboro, Massachusetts. When he was fourteen years old that arrangement had to be terminated and he was committed to his Uncle Bezaleel Howe's care in New York City. The latter's self-revealing letter planning for the lad's long journey with the help of Colonel Artemas Howe, one of the countless Massachusetts cousins, is somewhat odd in phraseology and spelling, but of clear content. It bears date of 15 July 1786 and is quoted in full.

Dear Madam

The Many Visestudes of fortune that I have Strugled with Since Last I Saw you has not made me unmindful; altho it has prevented me from Sending for My Brothers Son that is with you. For Some time after I arivd here it apeared to be a Mater of Doubt whether I Should Make a Living for my Self and the fates have not yet absolutely declared in my favor. I had but small dependances when I came here and Some of them have faild me. Together with the dulness of the times have been as Much as I could strugal with. My buseness is increasing and have formd tolerable Connections and I flatter My Self that I shall be able to Put Brigham in Sutch a way that he will become able to Make a Living for himself if he behaves well. At Least I shall do Every thing in My Power for him. I have Requested Col. Howe of Marlboro to take a Seat in the Stag for him and beg you would consent to his Coming and with No more Cloathing than just sufficient to Make him desent when he arrives. But I wish you to consider, Madam, that he is a Relation of yours

N. B. Pleas to Present My Compliments to Such of your famely as May Remember me.

The lad did behave well and avoided the snares and temptations which his uncle feared. He became a good business man with a successful grocery store on Gold Street. He married Sarah Meeks and was the father of ten children. Of special interest was his intimacy with his uncle Bezaleel Howe. The latter, remembering the days of his youth in Henniker and his hard taskmaster uncle, became a second father to Brigham Howe. Eventually both joined the Society of the Cincinnati—Bezaleel as an Original Member and Brigham as the son of an officer who had died in service—and many were the public occasions when the two men, twenty-four years apart in age, were together. Uncle and nephew attended the Society's banquet for Lafayette in Washington Hall on 6 September 1824. With deep memories they talked with the general about Baxter Howe and the Virginia campaign which cost him his life. Both looked forward to the Grand Erie Canal Celebration in October 1825 when the Cincinnati paraded in all its glory. But death claimed the uncle a few weeks before that memorable occasion. Brigham Howe was named executor in his uncle's will and carefully administered the small estate so that the widow and children were comfortably provided for. The intimate relationship of the brothers was continued for forty-four years after the death of Baxter Howe. A very encouraging note in family solidarity.

Baxter Howe of the fifth generation of Puritans lived a useful life. Bearing a distinguished given name, he with fine feeling preserved the same tradition with his son. His consistent military record, at contrast with his older brothers, speaks for itself even though his war diary, with his own intelligent observations, is missing. Sadness touches much of his life. His father's early death produced untold difficulties for his mother and her children. His two happy marriages were less than three years each. Because of war demands his son was five months old when he last saw him and his daughter only eight weeks. Yet without bitterness, despite all these anxieties and sufferings, he carried on as a good soldier, meeting every demand placed upon him. When at thirty-three years he was cut down by disease, contracted in the line of duty, he gave promise of notable service to his family group and to the new nation whose independence he had aided by his sacrifice.

33. Bezaleel Howe, the fourth son of Bezaleel and Anna Howe, was born at Marlborough a few weeks after his father's death on 28 November 1750. His three older brothers were eight, four and two years old, one sister was ten and the other six. To this group their Grandmother Howe had opened her home, but affairs were so confused that the baby was eight months old before he was baptized. In the meantime, an administrator had been appointed to straighten out his father's property, for he died without a will. As matters dragged along, the Marlborough authorities warned the widow to depart the town lest, recently arrived from Leicester, she and her brood would become a local charge. Bezaleel was nine years old when, with his next older brother, Baxter, he was placed in charge of his uncle, Eliakim Howe, who removed to Henniker, New Hampshire, a newly settled town, in 1763. There Bezaleel and Baxter, with their cousins Otis and Tilly of the same age, were helpful in clearing the land and constructing the first frame house. According to Bezaleel's reminiscences there was plenty of hard work and very little schooling—a fact that he regretted all his life. When Baxter was of age the guardianship terminated and apparently Bezaleel, nineteen years old, was included in the release. The young men joined their mother and sister, Edith Howe Bradford, in nearby Hillsborough. Baxter, aided and abetted by his brother-in-law

Timothy Bradford and his Wilkins cousins, took rank in the community, but Bezaleel's sole achievement seems to have been as chorister in the village church. We shall hear more of his good tenor voice.

Then the New Hampshire days were ended by the outbreak of the Revolution. Bezaleel's story of his enlistment, 20 April 1775, is somewhat casual, but we must remember that it was told long years afterwards. "On the morning when the solders (from Hillsborough) were to march (to Cambridge, Massachusetts), I stood looking on. One of the recruits, an old man, was surrounded by his wife and daughters who hung about his neck and wept bitterly. The scene affected my heart and I dashed up to him and said, 'Give me your gun and I will go for you and if the Government ever gets able to give me a gun I'll send the old thing back to you.' I was at Bunker Hill but treated very badly, not being brought into action but held with the reserve. I loaded and fired several times (apparently the reserve was not resting on its arms) but the old gun kicked so it almost dislocated my shoulder." At the Medford camp the twenty-five year old Hillsborough recruit enlisted in Captain Crosby's company of Colonel James Reed's New Hampshire regiment. Bezaleel Howe served with this unit stationed at Winter Hill, where his brother Baxter was a sergeant in a Massachusetts regiment, during the long and successful siege of British-held Boston.

Another of Bezaleel's remembrances concerned the hurried march of Washington's army for the defence of New York City. Somewhere along the way Captain Crosby's company lost its cook and Private Howe, having declared that if it was necessary he could bake good bread, was assigned the task. All went well until one day a group of marauding Tories suddenly captured the oven full of well prepared loaves. At the Battle of Long Island, where Baxter Howe was taken prisoner, his younger brother seems to have stood up well. At least after his death a Veteran of that field by the name of Mills told Bezaleel's son, "I knew your father well. I was in his company on Long Island. Our captain ran away when the British attacked, 27 August 1776, and your father took command of us. We fought all day and at night ran twenty five miles." With due allowance for reminiscent exaggeration, it is the first evidence of Bezaleel's leadership. Shortly afterwards at the beginning of the retreat across New Jersey, 8 November 1776, Howe, having been transferred to Colonel John Stark's First New Hampshire regiment, was commissioned Second Lieutenant. This promotion came after six months' service in the ranks and in part confirmed his friend's reminiscence less the story of a twenty-five-mile run. The regiment was ferried in a fog from Brooklyn Heights to Manhattan Island.

FIFTH GENERATION

Of the action at Trenton the regimental history says, "Neither rain, snow or ice could stop the New England troops. They did not get across the Delaware River until three o'clock in the morning, and it was fully an hour later before they could take up the line of march. General Sullivan with his brigade of New Hampshire troops marched down a road near the river. Colonel Stark led the right wing and 'dealt death wherever he found resistance, and broke down all opposition before him.'" It was a brief but very significant action and, apparently, the newly commissioned Second Lieutenant did his full duty. His reminiscence is vitally interesting, "Several of the wealthy young men in my company felt annoyed that I should have been promoted from the ranks over them. Accordingly one of them wrote the commandant that I was a Tory and would desert at the first opportunity. It afterwards appeared that orders were actually given to shoot me on the spot if I attempted desertion." Following the victory "the officers repaired to the commander's marquee to offer congratulations. With spirits not much elated, I went also to make my best bow but was greatly surprised on entering the tent to have the general rise, extend his hand, give me a cordial greeting, commend my bravery and say he would report me for promotion. Nothing more was ever heard of my being a Tory." Soon after receiving General Sullivan's commendation, the high command's further confidence in Howe's integrity was revealed by his selection to carry to Philadelphia important messages for the Congress.

With other regiments the First New Hampshire, then commanded by Colonel Joseph Cilley, was sent by General Washington to reinforce the northern army under General Gates at Saratoga. The unit marched to Ticonderoga, fell back to Bemis Heights and in its most desperate encounter met the enemy about noon on 19 September 1777. "We met the enemy about one mile from our encampment, where the engagement began very closely, and continued about 20 minutes, in which time we lost so many men, and received no reinforcement, that we were obliged to retreat, but before we got to the encampment we met two regiments coming out as a reinforcement, when we returned and renewed the attack which continued very warm until dark, at which time we withdrew and retired to our encampment. In this engagement the enemy had two field pieces, which we took three or four times, but as it was in the woods, they were not removed." This terse description covered a part of the first battle of Freeman's Farm under the immediate direction of General Benedict Arnold. Neither side won a clear cut victory but the British were unable to advance and that was their essential objective. But in blocking them the Americans sustained heavy losses. In General Poor's brigade, which included the First New Hampshire, seventeen officers were wounded. Lieutenant Howe was one of these casualties. Not a word about his incapacity does he say in his reminiscences nor does he mention the surrender on October 17th. Apparently he was able to return with his regiment when they marched down the east side of the Hudson through Poughkeepsie and Peekskill to King's Ferry, crossed the river and rejoined, November 21st, Washington's army at White Marsh, near Philadelphia. The winter quarters were at Valley Forge.

Of that place Howe has but one comment. "The weather was intensely cold. A detachment of British were moving around us and threatening us with attack. We tore up our blankets and made cartridges and then the rascals never came. We suffered intensely for want of clothing but there was no help." The Lieutenant was a seasoned soldier prepared to take whatever came. At Monmouth, 28 June 1778, the First New Hampshire was in the forefront of the battle to prevent General Clinton's return to New York City. Although Lee failed to obey orders and the British continued their march to Manhattan Island they suffered losses in personnel and in morale. Then Colonel Cilley's command was sent to Danbury, Connecticut, for guard duty.

In the spring of 1779 the regiment marched back across New Jersey and joined General Sullivan's western army. At Wyoming, Pennsylvania, Bezaleel Howe received his promotion as First Lieutenant on 23 June. Two and one half years before, preceding the action at Trenton, he had been made a subaltern but this time there was no adverse criticism for his record specified "a Vigilant, faithful and good officer." He must have participated with the greatest enthusiasm in the many post prandial toasts when General Poor entertained the officers of his brigade on the third anniversary of American Independence.

Then came the dangerous march of Sullivan's army into an unknown area through leagues of unbroken forests in order to break the power of the Six Nations and of the Tories operating from Fort Niagara. On 29 August with Poor's brigade leading the right flank, the army attacked the enemy's line extending from the Chemung River to the mountains near Newtown. Joseph Brant was at the head of the savages who "gave a most hideous yell which resounded in the mountains as if covered with them." The Indians were panic stricken by the American artillery, and never again did they make a stand in numbers. Proud of its part in the victory, the First New Hampshire returned to Easton in October and some months later joined Washington's army camping along the west bank of the Hudson River. The discovery of Benedict Arnold's treason plot in the nick of time resulted in the hanging of Major John André at Tappan on 2 October 1780. Howe commented, "André was dressed as neatly as if he was going to a ball with his boots nicely polished. My own feelings were greatly affected as they marched to the execution to the tune of "Roslyn Castle", a dead march. Scarcely a dry eye could be seen in the American ranks. André's bearing was manly to the last."

In 1781 when recruits were vital to the maintenance of the army, Lieutenants Howe and Boynton were detached from their regiment and sent into New Hampshire. Five months' efforts were more or less successful. In reporting his work to the Hon. Meshech Weare, President of New Hampshire, Howe wrote at Amherst 10 July, "I am happy to informe you that the Late Resolution of the Honorable Cort semes to give new Spirits to the People in this Quarter—that they seme Determined to fill up the Continental Army for which Men are dayly Mustering. . . . I almost blush to informe you of the little worth of paper Money here—the new Emission Passes curent with them that have got it. But that's not me and a Man that is mutch deprecated must Beg of your Honours Influence in the Committee of Safety to send me one hundred Dollars for which I will account for—upon ashureing your Honour that I make use of all the eonomy that I am Master of to live to prevent making expence to the State. Except My wishes for your health and Believe Me to Be with evry sentiment of Esteem your Honours Most obedient and Humble servant." There could be no franker statement of the condition of national finances. During this tour of duty in his home state he met his mother and sister for the first time in six years, as we have learned, and their demonstrative feelings caused him to lose control of himself. He declared that he would go away and never come back. One of the saddest incidents in the family's history.

Returning to his regiment in Westchester County, New York, he was with the allied army under Washington and Rochambeau when it crossed the Hudson River and began its great march southward 19 August 1781. Hard, forced marches against time followed. "Every day we lose is comparatively an age" was the commander's statement as he hurried his men to Virginia. On September 28 the allies joined Lafayette's force at Williamsburgh. There sad news awaited Bezaleel Howe. His older brother, Baxter, had succumbed to fever the week before. This was a tragic message, for the two brothers were very congenial. Bezaleel's only intimate family tie was broken. The New Hampshire officer carried on with a heavy heart.

As the French and Americans closed in on Yorktown, an unsucsuccessful British sortie threw into momentary confusion Colonel Alexander Hamilton's regiment in which Howe, as a sharpshooter, was serving. Under heavy fire the lieutenant ran back to the barn, led out Hamilton's valued war horse, mounted him bareback and with only a halter rode him to safety. This cool act won the Colonel's praise and was duly reported to the Commander-in-Chief. Incidentally, years later Mrs. Hamilton spoke of the incident to Bezaleel Howe's son.

On October 11th Hamilton led a terrific attack on the beleaguered British. Howe took part and again won the Colonel's commendation. Six days later Lord Cornwallis asked for a parley and the surrender, with the enemy's bands playing "The world is turned upside down," took place on the nineteenth. This victory, the culmination of the war in which all Four Brothers had fought, one of them laying down his life in sacrifice, assured the attainment of America's independence.

The army marched back to the west bank of the Hudson and was huddled around New Windsor. Restlessness was the order of the day for the idle men in 1782. "Howe felt he had been grossly insulted by the colonel and major of another regiment and challenged them both. But being a marksman of unusual ability who could pace off twenty paces, turn around and hit a coin nineteen out of twenty times, friends interposed and an amende honorable was made." Following this incident the rather fiery lieutenant was kept busy with special assignments. One of the most important came in March 1783 when under a flag of truce he carried important dispatches from General Washington to the British authorities in New York concerning the formal cessation of hostilities. His pass for return through the British lines was a colorful document, "Permit the bearer, Lieut. Bezaleel Howe, to pass to the American lines unmolested" signed by the notorious Tory leader, James DeLancey. Finally on 5 September 1783 the New Hampshire officer was detached from his regiment and assigned to the command of the Life Guards.

With peace assured the Commander-in-Chief removed from Newburgh to Rocky Hill, New Jersey, the last headquarters of the Revolution. There Howe had an interesting experience. "One day the General bade me walk with him to a dilapidated building. On entering we ascended a ladder to the upper floor where Washington placed a small bag of money and covered it with rubbish telling me to come there the next day and pay certain men." Helping to pack the family's goods for transport to Mt. Vernon, "I accidentally cut my finger and the general bade me go to the house where Mrs. Washington bound up the wound in balsam apple." There also his efficiency brought him his third and last promotion in the Continental Army. The commission bore the signature of Elias Boudinot, President of Congress, at Princeton 10 October 1783. "In pursuance of an Act of Congress of the thirtieth day of September AD 1783, Bezaleel Howe Esquire is to rank as a Captain by brevet in the army of the United States of America."

In transferring the General's goods to his home in Mount Vernon, six wagons were requisitioned under a guard of mounted infantry commanded by Brevet Captain Howe. His instructions, 9 November, signed by General Washington, read "You will take charge of the Waggons which contain my baggage, and with the escort proceed with them to Virginia and deliver the baggage at my house ten miles below Alexandria. As you know they contain all my Papers which are of immense value to me, I am sure it is unnecessary to request your particular attention to them—but as you will have several ferries to pass and some of them wide particularly the Susquehannah and Potomac I must caution you against crossing them if the Wind should be high or if there is in your Judgment or the opinion of others the least danger. The Waggons should never be without a Sentinel over them always locked and the keys in your possession. . . . Your road be through Philadelphia and Wilmington, thence by the Head of Elk to the lower ferry on the Susquehannah and thence by Baltimore, Bladensburgh, Georgetown and Alexandria to Mount Vernon.

A few days after the British evacuated New York City, there occurred a very memorable ceremony at Fraunces Tavern on Broad Street. At noon Thursday, 4 December, Washington said farewell to a large company of his officers. These men, amid the deepest silence, watched their Commander take a glass of wine and then heard him, in solemn and measured tone, say, "With a heart full of love and gratitude, I now take leave of you. I devoutly wish that your latter days may be as prosperous and happy as your former ones have been glorious and honorable." Then following General Knox, the group in single file, approached the General and shook his hand. Emotion was uppermost in the heart of each man present. Captain Howe, sharing to the full the feelings of the occasion, remembered its intensity all his life. His own discharge from the Continental Army followed two weeks later, 20 December, at Constitution Island near West Point. For over eight and one half years he had been in the armed forces, serving in many campaigns and in six major battles. At the age of thirty-three years he was free to choose a new and untried path.

Most significantly he did not return to the New England of his birth and boyhood. Marlborough from which his mother had been "warned" had no appeal and neither did Hillsborough, the place of his enlistment. In 1784 with many other soldiers of the old army from various states, Howe established his residence in New York City. Promptly he received his Cincinnati Society credentials—a most prized possession.

Be it known that Bezaleel Howe Esquire Captain in the First New Hampshire Regiment is a member of the Society of the CINCINNATI; instituted by the Officers of the American Army, at the Period of its Dissolution, as well to commemorate the great Event which gave Independence to North America, as for the laudable Purpose of inculcating the Duty of laying down in Peace Arms assumed for public Defence, and of uniting in Acts of brotherly Affection, and Bonds of perpetual Friendships the Members constituting the same.

In Testimony whereof I, the President of the said Society have hereunto set my Hand at Mount Vernon in the State of Virginia this tenth day of December in the year of our Lord One Thousand Seven Hundred and Eighty Five and in the Tenth Year of the Independence of the United States.

By order, H. Kuox, Secretary

G. Washington, President

This document bearing well known signatures was a symbol of encouragement and confidence, come weal or woe, among the strange ways of the city.

The 1786 directory announced, "Howe and Prince, merchants, 86 Water Street," but the next year it is, "Bezl. Howe, grocer," at the same address. The details of his first business venture are unknown but they could not have been very satisfactory. Far more to his understanding was his commission from Governor George Clinton as a captain in the New York militia, 4 October 1786. The business must have gained momentum for the New York Packet, 26 November 1787, carried this notice, "Howe, Captain Bezaleel married last Wednesday evening to Miss Hannah Merritt of Mamaroneck, Westchester County, by Rev. John Gano, Baptist." The bride was the youngest of the three children of Edward Merritt, a prosperous farmer, whose English born grandfather was an early settler in Rye. Needless to add, the minister was a member of the Cincinnati, having served as a popular chaplain in the Continental Army and shared the rigors of Sullivan's western campaign with the bridegroom. The couple established their home in the Water Street house.

A projected removal to New Orleans secured Howe five letters of recommendation from prominent officers of the Continental Army. These were duly shown to the Spanish minister who secured a passport for Howe and his wife from Governor Stephen Miro dated 23 October 1788. But Howe's plans were revolutionized by the arrival of a daughter, Maria, 6 January 1789. The resulting happiness and responsibility caused the new father, in place of struggling with a foreign language, to continue with his business on Manhattan Island. Two years went by before another and more congenial occupation ended the striving for success as a civilian.

On 7 March, Howe received word from Henry Knox, the Secretary of War, that President Washington had appointed him a lieutenant in the newly organized Second Regiment of Infantry. Men were urgently needed for the Indian War in Ohio and in their enlistment and training Howe was deemed proficient. He was promoted captain, November 4, but the formal commission was not issued until 19 March 1793. In the meantime he had been ordered to commence recruiting service in New York State with headquarters at West Point. At this post his wife and daughter, who had been living with her father, Edward Merritt, in Mamaroneck, joined him. It was a deep satisfaction to have their own home—this privilege, as we know, had not often been Howe's lot. With a salary of forty dollars per month plus commissions on recruits, an hospitable home served by "Het, a Slave," and opportunity for advancement, all was well. From Timothy Pickering, Secretary of War, came word of his promotion to major, 12 March 1795. The Indian uprising being crushed by General Wayne's victory on the Maumee River, Howe was transferred to New York City. A war scare was on and defences for the metropolis were being readied. The Major's home was at 80 Fair Street—the present Fulton Street. Then came rumors from the capital at Philadelphia concerning a possible assignment to a southern or western garrison. On 1 November 1796 "the commander in Chief requested Major Howe's company at dinner today at four o'clock." Doubtless innumerable stories were told of Saratoga, Yorktown, and the Ohio frontier and as many toasts. One was to the health, happiness and prosperity of the popular officer who was leaving the army for the gentler art of the civilian.

The Collector of the Port of New York, Joshua Sands, appointed the ex-Major, his resignation having become effective on the day of the commander's dinner party, to a position in the Custom House. The family moved to 50 Cherry Street where they entertained the English traveller, John Davis, as a paying guest. A subsequent colorful but highly fanciful report of the Major appeared in Davis's Travels of Four Years and A Half in the United States. Its description of Howe as a Deist disturbed his wife and has caused anxiety to some of his descendants, but the subject himself took it in his stride. He was drawing a salary of $600. with the promise of $1,000. as soon as his formal appointment as Inspector was received. Family affairs were propitious until the pestilence fell on the city in July 1798. Maria was promptly sent to her uncle and aunt in Westchester County, but her father and mother with Black Hetty stayed on Cherry Street. All went well until the couple were stricken. The husband survived the ordeal, but his wife died on September 18. On the next day Hannah Merritt Howe's funeral was recorded among sixty-three others. Her burial took place in the Baptist Cemetery on the west side of Gold Street near Fulton Street. Thus was ended a happy married life of eleven years duration.

On 8 July 1799 Bezaleel Howe was appointed "Inspector of the Revenue in the District of the City of New York." Except for political upheavals and the closing of the port during the Embargo, the Major held this position for the balance of his life. In the Custom House was Major Jacob Wright of the old army and a close friend of the new appointee. His wife was Margaret Moffat from Little Britain near the New Windsor camp—the Wrights' marriage was the culmination of a war time romance. Their Washington Street home often welcomed Major Howe. A frequent visitor also was Margaret Wright's twenty-five year old sister, Catherine. Although the widower was in his fiftieth year with a small daughter, he became very fond of Catherine and the feeling was returned. At the Wrights' home, 15 February 1800, they were married.

With Catherine's frugal and wise management in the Cherry Street house, everything went well. Her influence caused his formal joining of the New York State Society of the Cincinnati and his receipt for initiation fees, "twenty six 67/100 Dollars being one month's pay as Lieut." was signed by Leonard Bleecker, Treasurer, and Howe placed his name on the roll, 4 July 1800. His wife was active in other ways also. When the old army men visited the house, the bottles on the side board were not neglected especially when they fought over their battles for the fiftieth time. But the good wife was not lacking in mother wit and, as opportunity offered, always diluted the liquor with the best pump water the city afforded.

On 1 January 1801 a characteristic letter from Howe went to the Surveyor of the Port of New York. "Among the crowds that may appear to give and receive congratulations at the opening of a new century with a new year I wish to appear and present my wishes for your health and that you may find additions to your happiness for many years to come. Whatever may be the auspices of our Nation at this period I as ever shall demean myself as a good citizen and as such I take the Liberty to state to you some of the Casualties that has fell in my way the past year. First an Honest friend of mine who had Experienced by Shipwreck a loss of all his property when just getting into business was sure he was unable to pay and I was his Backer and paid $70. on that. I lost a check on the bank for $50. I have given in charity $50. that I do not lament. I have paid a fine of $50. at the Custom House and ask your influence that the fine may be refunded with this assurance that I shall in future not take more Vessels than I can carefully attend which I have ever considered my only Crime (due to) the multiplicity of business at the time. These Casualties has induced me to make this request to you. The many years that I have served our Country as a Soldier its not made me ritche and to make a Comfortable living now is my only Care. The sickness of my famely the past Season with other Casualty's has brought me rather behind hand and puts a gloom on my Countenance on these days of General Congratulations. I cannot close without adding this observance that the loss of the $50. is far less to me than being Suspected by you of Inattention to Duty and 50 Dolls. at this time I think would be of more Consequence (to me) than to the United States." Evidently the Inspector knew his way around and how to get out of a bad situation.

But there was no avoidance of the cost of a loan to a New Hampshire friend. As security for $250 Robert Smith gave Howe deeds for Lot 23 in Sempronius and Lots 25 and 33 in Hannibal. They were situated in the Military Tract of Central New York where the New Hampshire officers, while stationed at the New Windsor camp at the close of the war, had vainly sought land grants. In 1801 Howe realized this ambition but in a somewhat backhanded way for the loan was never paid. "I own 725 acres" was his oft repeated and much enjoyed statement although the possession of this upstate land only brought him tax bills. Despite all these "Casualties" as he called certain of his experiences, he and his wife lived comfortably bringing up five children, three others died in infancy, on the salary from the Custom House. The Major had the satisfaction of attending the weddings of two of his daughters. In 1805 at the age of sixteen Maria, his oldest and the only child of Hannah Merritt, married John Guion, Jr., of Rye. That family name of French origin denoted the descendant of an old and distinguished Huguenot family. From the bride's father came very gracious words and a generous present. "This marriage met my entire approbation and I immediately conveyed to the couple the Mamaroneck farm received by my first wife from her father." This was the chief part of Hannah's 1791 legacy from Edward Merritt, Sr.

FIFTH GENERATION

Greatly increased in value Maria and John realized $2500. by its sale when they moved to New York City in 1810. A decade later Howe recounted the transaction in his will regretting that he was unable to include his oldest daughter in its bequests. The second wedding, 1820, was of Margaretta, the oldest surviving daughter of Catherine Moffat, and George Washington Dupignac of New York City. He was a New Englander born in New London and with his sixteen year old bride established their home at 2 Catherine Street. Their first child was Bezaleel Howe Dupignac, a great satisfaction to the Major. During his life he welcomed three Dupignac and nine Guion grandchildren so he was confident of the future of his family.

In his 68th year Howe applied for a pension under the liberal law of 1818. On August 4th the Secretary of War, John C. Calhoun, approved the allowance of twenty dollars a month to the former New Hampshire officer. But this good fortune lasted only two years. In 1820 Congress, more economy minded, required pensioners to prove themselves indigent. Such a requirement for veterans of the Revolution, Howe declared in the plainest Anglo Saxon to be an insult and with his old soldier friends paraded in protest. Nevertheless the law makers were adamant and the pension ceased when Howe at the age of seventy needed it most. Then at the Custom House his title became "Temporary Inspector" but his salary was paid to the end of his life, although he was incapacitated for months—a much appreciated recognition of his forty-two years service, military and civil, for the United States.

Among his other interests the Society of the Cincinnati was foremost. He was invariably called on for a song and a story at the meetings and always drew much acclaim. Also he enjoyed the distinction, due to his war service, of answering roll call as "Lieutenant" Howe whereas his nephew was merely plain "Mr." as he was a member by descent. This hereditary membership caused strong criticism of the Society as undemocratic, tending to establish an American nobility. But Howe's political creed was indicated by the Cincinnati's memorial in Trinity Church to Alexander Hamilton, "A Man to whom the age has produced no superior." At the funeral, 14 July 1804, Howe was present with vivid memories of Yorktown and approving every word of Gouveneur Morris's eulogium. At the Society's many public ceremonies there was no more devoted participant than the one time New Hampshire officer. With his badge in evidence he was always delighted to march in formal procession with his fellow members. The Society in a body waited upon President Monroe on his official visit to New York, 11 June 1817, and Howe was heartened to hear the Chief Executive say, "Those whose zeal and patriotism were so fully tried in that struggle (the Revolution) will never fail to rally to the standard of their country in any emergency." When the remains of General Richard Montgomery were brought from Quebec and reinterred in St. Paul's Churchyard, 8 July 1818, the Cincinnati in full regalia paid the last tribute of respect to that hero of the Revolution. Howe was also present at the Society's banquet in Washington Hall, 6 September 1824, for Lafayette, their fellow member, to honor his services "in our glorious Revolution." Again the Virginia campaign was recalled with the death of Captain Baxter Howe for the benefit of his son, Brigham, who sat at table with his uncle. This memorial occasion was the last Cincinnati meeting attended by Bezaleel Howe who for long years had been not a little proud of his Eagle Badge.

Another relationship, strange in the light of a certain English traveller's statement, developed at the Presbyterian Church on Cedar Street. Faith for this world and the next, combating the backwash of the French Revolution, was eloquently proclaimed by Dr. John B. Romeyn. His power attracted Catherine with her religious background and her solicitude for her children and the couple became pew holders and regular attendants at these inspiring services.

Many of his Old Army friends were passing on. Jacob Wright among others, and Bezaleel Howe was becoming conscious of wide gaps in the ranks. But new strength was increasingly available. Help in the maintenance of the home came from the two older sons—George, a watchmaker and silversmith, with a jewelry store on Chatham Street, and John, employed by a successful merchant tailor on Maiden Lane. Two married daughters, Maria Guion on Rose Street and Margareta Dupignac on Catherine Street, were near their father. A much respected citizen and successful grocer was his nephew, Brigham Howe, to whom the Major had been in loco parentis and who never failed in appreciation. Significantly this man was named executor of his estate. On 16 September 1825, in his seventy-fifth year, death claimed Major Howe.

His life falls into three parts—the Continental Army, the Regular Army, and the Custom House. In each he won and held the confidence of his superiors. His marriages—eleven years for one and in the twenty-sixth year for the other—were happy and all his children honored his memory. A genial man with songs and stories for all occasions and possessing many friends was the youngest of the Four Brothers.
