

The VAN DER VEER
FAMILY in the Netherlands

1150 to 1660 and 1280 to 1780

By LOUIS P. DE BOER, A.M., L.L.B.

Published by CHARLES ANDREW DITMAS
PUBLISHER--350 FULTON STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Copyrighted, 1913
BY CHARLES A. DITMAS

BROOKLYN EAGLE PRESS
BROOKLYN - NEW YORK

PRESENT LADY VAN DER VEERE.
QUEEN WILHELMINA AND THE PRINCESS JULIANA.

ILLUSTRATIONS

Present Lady Van der Veer.....	Frontispiece
The First Zeeland Nobleman....	Opposite page 4
Dutch Chart	“ “ 10
Map of Zeeland.....	“ “ 12
Castle Sandenburg	“ “ 14
The City of Veere.....	“ “ 28
The Town Hall of Veere.....	“ “ 46
Castle Scaghen	“ “ 52
Castle Scaghen at the Present Time	“ “ 56
Scaghen To-day.....	“ “ 58
Arms of the Van der Veer and Van Scaghen Families.....	“ “ 60

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Introduction	1
The Van Borselen Family.....	3
The Van der Veer Family.....	10
Appendix I.....	60
Appendix II.....	61

The Van der Veer Family in the Netherlands

From 1160 to 1660 (XVIII Generations)

INTRODUCTION

THE writing of the history of a family is commonly begun there, where THROUGH THE ACQUISITION OF A SPECIAL NAME, from family-branch IT BECOMES A SEPARATE and well distinguished CONSANGUINITY. Although from the most general point of view it still remains a branch, we consider ourselves to stand at the root of the separately planted family-tree, when we have reachèd the origin of THE NAME. Instead of calling the parts, branches of one stem, we prefer to speak about the unit as a family-group or a house.

In Europe the splitting up of houses into families has taken place at large in the Middle-ages when the population rapidly increased. Like a bee-hive, the ancestral grounds soon became too small and young and energetic swarms had to find new fields. In the Netherlands for instance the Van Cats took their direct origin from the Van Welles; the Van Voorsts were originally Van Heeckereens and these were a branch of the Van der Eses.

The Van der Veer Family

The Van der Veer family likewise started as a branch of the Van Borsselen family. The name was in the beginning merely a title added to the Van Borsselen name on ground of property of the name.

The Van Borsselen name itself can even be traced to the time that it was a title and that its bearers had only first names, given to them still more or less according to the conventional and distinctive rules of the old Teutonic name system. This heraldic name system is still kept rather pure among the Seelanders and to a certain extent among the other Scandinavians and the Frisians. In Holland and the Southern-Netherlands the heraldic name system left very little traces after the crusades; heraldic titles derived from properties and armorials had taken the place of heraldic names derived from qualities and characteristics. The heraldic names long preserved in the Van Borssele family and its branches were: Wolfert, Frank and Hendrick. Of these Wolfert had been in the family longest of all and showed the most persistence in newer times. It even showed itself in the armorial bearings, which have been handed down in the Van der Veer line. Frank, became the exclusive favorite name of the Van Borssele Van Cortgene; Hendrick, that of the Van Borssele Van der Veer.

In the Netherlands

THE VAN BORSSELE FAMILY

(Before the Van der Veer's branched off)

Although there are some earlier traditions the earliest facts climb up to the year 1160.

I. Floris, VIIIth Lord of Borssele, a place on the Island of South-Beveland in Seeland, received in 1161 from Floris III, Count of Holland and Seeland, "his cousin,"

The Van der Veer Family

the exclusive right to reclaim some lands off the South-East coast of the Island of North-Beveland. He and his two sons: Wolfert and Baldwin helped him to carry out the work. After their father's death in 1203 they continued it.

Floris VIII, of Borssele, also had a daughter Agnes, whose husband died in 1214 in battle against the Frisians near Alkmaar.

See: "Seewsche Chroniken" ("Seeland Chronicles") by Reigersberch, Boxthorn, and Smallegange.

Also: Joh. Kok. "Vaderlandsch Woordenboek" XXIX p. 163-177.

And: David Van Hoogstraten: "Groot Woordenboek." B. p. 46.

II. Wolfert, IXth Lord of Borssele, succeeded his father in 1203. He married a lady Van der Goude, and obtained much property in Holland near Gouda and Schoonhoven.

They had five children.

Frank, Wolfert, Floris, Pieter and Sophia.

1. Frank follows below as Xth Lord Van Borssele.

From an old print, redrawn by Mr. De Boer.

THE FIRST SEELAND NOBLEMAN.

In the Netherlands

2. Wolfert became Lord of Baersdorp on the Island of South-Beveland and founder of the Van Baersdorp family.

He died young in 1223 leaving three little sons. The Van Baersdorp family died out in 1565.

3. Floris was still alive in 1255.
4. Pieter was still alive in 1263.
5. Sophia, inherited her maternal property near Gouda and Schoonhoven. She married, but dying childless, she bequested her land property to her brothers.

See: "Chronicles" and also: Joh. Kok: Tabel 1, col. 2.

Generation:

III. Frank, Xth Lord Van Borselen was alive in 1258. He received as a favor from William II, Count of Holland and Seeland and "King of the Romans," the lordly manor of Monster (Monasterium) in South Holland.

The Van der Veer Family

Three children are mentioned:

1. Wolfert, follows below as XI Lord Van Borssele.
2. Frank, who became the father of Wolfert, Ist Lord Van der Veer. (See under IV.)
3. Hadewich, a daughter, who married. (See Hillebrand Van Wouw: Chronike Van Holland, and also La Rue: "Geletterd Seeland.")

Generation.

IVa. Wolfert, XIth Lord Van Borssele, was born in 1216, and did not succeed his father before he was over forty years old. After Count Willem II in 1256 had perished in his warfare against the Frisians by Schagen and Hoogwoud, near Alkmaar. Wolfert became guardian of the minor Count Floris V. On account of this guardianship he spent most of his time in Holland in his house at Delft or at Gouda and Schoonhoven. He married an English lady Anna de Bostequ and had the following children:

Floris, Thomas and Margaretha.

In the Netherlands

Although the attitude of Count Floris V toward Seeland, after he had become ruler himself, did not please Wolfert, he never broke the friendship. After Floris V had been murdered in 1296 Wolfert XI Lord Van Borselen, became guardian over his minor son Jan I.

During this guardianship, Wolfert, who was now very old, resided for the second time as regent of Holland and Seeland at his house at Delft. Contrary to the politics of the late Count, Wolfert, like most of the Seeland nobles favored a commercial alliance and a free trade union between Holland, Flandres and England. The Hollanders, who wanted protection for their growing commerce and their developing industry of woolweaving, rose against him, murdered the old man in his bed during the night and set fire to the beautiful house.

Wolfert's oldest son, Floris, was among the conspirators. He had tried to make himself popular, hoping thus to become Count of Holland himself. This happened in 1298. In 1299 the weak and sickly heir of the ancient native Count of Holland died and the punishment of Floris Van Borsele was left to the first succeeding Count of the new house, Jan of Henault, who had been guardian over Jan of Holland since Wolfert's death in 1298.

The Van der Veer Family

See: Chronicles of Holland and Seeland. More especially: David Van Hoogstraten. Gróot Woordenboek. VIII. p. 868. Also: P. J. Blok: "Geschiedenis Van Het Nederlandsche Volk" I. p. 200.)

Floris Van Borssele considered himself as XIIth Lord Van Borssele, but being one of the conspirators in the case of his father's murder, he was not acknowledged as such by the family. His second and only brother, Thomas, took his place.

Generation:

Va. Thomas Van Borssele was the XII and last Lord of Borssele. Jan of Henault, who had married a sister of Floris V, Count of Holland, had succeeded in Holland and Seeland after the death of his nephew, Jan of Holland. His feud with Flandres was increased by his new acquisitions. As associate of King Philip of France he had attacked the Flemish from the land side as his second son William had done from the seaside near Seeland. The Flemish defeated their enemies in the glorious "Battle of the Spurs" near Courtray in 1303 and victoriously entered Seeland, the country of their friends, so as to drive the Hollanders out.

In the Netherlands

At first William of Henault was beaten, but in 1304 the new Count of Holland and his sons drove the Flemings out of Seeland. (See P. J. Blok: History of the Netherland people. Dutch Edition I, pp. 204-6.)

In 1305 Thomas Van Borssele, chief of a family, who had always been in favor of a Flemish-English alliance and son of an English mother, was deprived from his father's inheritance at Borssele by Jan of Henault, Count of Holland and Seeland, favorite of France.

(See Joh. Kok. Vaderlandsch Woordenboek.)

Borssele was confiscated and from St. Martinsday 1305 to 1417 it had been under the direct jurisdiction of the province of Seeland and her sovereigns. The name Bors-

The Van der Veer Family

sele is an assimilated form of Borg-sele and corresponds in Seeland Flemish with the modern Dutch words Burg-Zyl of "Castle-Sluice."

THE VAN DER VEER FAMILY

In consideration of the above stated principles of genealogical system and writing of family history, we may count ourselves fortunate in the case of the Van der Veer family. The Charter by which the title to the land round Veere and therewith the name Van der Veer was established, has come down to us.

Generation :

IV. Frank Van Borsselen, second son of Frank, the Xth Lord Van Borsselen, married Maria Van Egmond, daughter of Willem Van Egmond and Ada. Their children were:

1. Wolfert, who became the Ist Lord Van der Veer.

GESLACHT VAN DEN HUIZE VAN BORSSELEN.

VII. Deel, bl. 811.

VAN DER VEERE.

(†) WOLPHERT VAN BORSSELEN, Heer van der Veere, Sandenburg, Sandijk en Cleversterke, trouwde met Sibilla en verwekte daarbij:

1. WOLPHERT of Wolp'aart, die volgt.
2. Floris, die ter vrouw had Agnes van Au dit.
3. Klaas, volgt mede, op Col. 8.
4. FRANK, volgt na hem, op Col. 10.
5. Haadwich van Borsfelen van der Veere, trouwde met den Ridder Gerrit van Voerne.
6. Sijbille van Borsfelen, trouwde met Philip, Heer van Maldegem, eg overleed A6. 1352.

Margriet van Borsfelen, trouwde met den Ridder Gerrit van Wesemale, Heer van Merem en Schoote.

WOLPHERT, de tweede Heer van Borsfelen van der Veere, Sandijk en Cleversterke, in de jaaren 1307, 1305 en 1329 zeer beroemd, sneuvelde, A6. 1345. in een slag tegen de Oost-Friezen. Zijne eerste vrouw was Alit van Henegouwen, en de tweede Hadewich Bez van der Eem, waarbij hij verwekte een zoon en een dochter:

1. WOLPHERT, die volgt.
2. Alit van Borsfelen, gehuwd aan Jan van Heenvliet op Bleijselein, overleed in 1364.

WOLPHERT, de derde Heer van Borsfelen van der Veere, Sandenburg, Sandijk, Cleversterken, de Polder, enz. had ter vrouwe Margriet van Arnhemuiden, en liet na twee zoonen:

1. Hendrik, Heer van den Veere, enz. Hij was eerst getrouwd met een vrouw uit den huize van Ellenoutsdijk, die hem baarde, WOLPHERT, die volgt, en daarna met vrouw Margreta van Nienrode, dochter van Otto van Nienrode, waarbij hij verwekte, Catharina van Borsfelen, gehuwd met Allard, Heer van Pouque.

2. Hendrik van Borsfelen, Graaf van Grand-Pre, Heer van der Veere, enz. overleed 1474. Zijne Gemalin was Janne van Halewijn, Vrouw van Hemsrode; hij liet na een wettigen zoon Wolp'ert, en twee bastaarden, Paulus en Wolp'ert.

WOLPHERT van Borsfelen, Graaf van Grand-Pre, Heer van der Veer, Vlielagen, West Kapelle en Domburg, Ridder van het Guide Vlies trouwde, eerst met Maria Stuart, die hem een zoon baarde, genaamd

Karel, jong gestorven; en daarna met Charlotte van Montpenfier. Hij overleed in 1487, nalatende:

1. Margreta.
2. Anna van Borsfelen, trouwde eerst met Philip van Bourgondiën, en daarna met Lodewijk van Montfort, die even als Philip, bij gebrek van mans oir, gehuwd werd.
3. Margriet van Borsfelen, Vrouwe van Cleefinge en Riedkerk, trouwde, A6. 1492, met Witrave van Brederode, die zij kinderen naliet.

Paulus van Borsfelen, Bastard van Hendrik, Heer van Schellog en van Leterdaale, Baljuw van der Veer, getrouwd met Alit van Haarlens, heeft nagelaten:

1. Hendrik van Borsfelen.
2. Margreta van Borsfelen, getrouwd met Heer Jan de Haent.
3. Anna van Borsfelen, gehuwd met Thomas van de Abele.

Wolp'ert van Borsfelen, de tweede Bastardzoon van Heer Hendrik, Heer van Spreeuwestein en Burgemeester van Axels trouwde, eerst met Jacqueliëna van der Capelle, Heer Joot dochter, en won bij haar, Wolp'ert van Borsfelen, Heer van Spreeuwestein, Erf-Baljuw van Brouwershaven, getrouwd eerst met Magdalenka, Bastarddochter van Cruiningen, en daarna met Marsine van Borsfelen van der Hooge. In beide de huwelijken verwekte hij kinderen, en liet buiten dien na een Bastardzoon, Cornelis.

Uit het eerste huwelijk bleef na, Anna van Borsfelen, getrouwd met Engel Dirck van Lesanen, die zij twee zoonen en een dochter baarde.

In zijn tweede huwelijk, met Amelberge van Leis, Lievens dochter, verwekte hij twee zoonen:

1. Adolp, die volgt. (a)
2. Wolp'ert, volgt na hem. (b)

ADOLP (a) van Borsfelen, Baljuw van Brouwershaven, had eerst ter vrouwe Catharina B. dochter van den Heer Maarten van Hoorn, Heer van Graasbeck, en daarna Lietrina Tull van Serootkerke, nalatende:

1. Jacob, getrouwd met Catharina van Haamsede, die hem twee zoonen en twee dochters baarde:

1. Adolp, ongehuwd gestorven.
2. Wolp'ert, gehuwd met Maria Oversticht.
3. Lietrina, niet ongehuwd.
4. Anna, trouwde eerst met Willem van Hershbeke, en daarna met Pieter Everwijn.

II. Wolp'ert van Borsfelen, Heer van Duisenrijke, enz. trouwde eerst Cornelia van Aljala, en daarna Louisa van der Laan; hij had bij de eerste:

1. Adolp, ongehuwd.
2. Maximiliaan, gehuwd met Lucretia de la Fontree.
3. Lietrina, ongehuwd gestorven.
4. Beaufoise, getrouwd met Pieter van Salsbrill.
5. Cornelia, gehuwd, in den jaare 1644, met Eduard Everwijn.

III. Leonora van Borsfelen, heeft vier mannen gehad: I. Jacob de Bernuij. II. Roeland van Averkereke. II. Gerrard de la Faille, Ridder. En IV. Simon van de Herve.

WOLPHERT (b) van Borsfelen, Heer van Spreeuwestein, Baljuw van der Gces, enz. trouwde eerst Maria van Hondagem; II. Maria van de Herve; III. Maria van Lier; en IV. Anna van Lier. Uit het derde huwelijk liet hij na:

1. Philibert van Borsfelen, geh. met Lucretia van Hershbeke, waarbij hij verwekt heeft:

1. Wolp'ert van Borsfelen.
2. Jan van Borsfelen.
3. Philibert van Borsfelen.
4. Philip Philibert van Borsfelen.
5. Maria van Borsfelen.
6. Elisabeth van Borsfelen.

II. Rogier van Borsfelen, Kapitein en Commandeur van Amel, trouwde met Sabina Langswaer, en liet na:

1. Maria van Borsfelen, ongehuwd.
2. Jenny Isabella van Borsfelen, trouwde met Louis van Hacstenduk, en daarna met Bouwen van Steenhuizen.
3. Martina van Borsfelen, geh. met Cornelis van Blijburg, Heer van Dertmond.

Uit het vierde huwelijk had hij, Anna van Borsfelen, die eerst trouwde met Christofel van Schagen, en daarna met Jacob Thuis van Rulkenlein, die zij eene dochter baarde.

In the Netherlands

2. Frank, 3 Hendrick (who became a priest); 4 Jan, who died in the battle in .1299 and Hadewich, the only daughter.

(See: Hendrick Van Wyn's article of 1794 published in "de Werken Van Het Zeeuwsch Genootschap Van Wetenschappen" 1837.)

V. Wolfert Van Borselen, like his father, occupied himself with the reclaiming of land off the North East Coast of Walcheren, right opposite the other banks of the Easterscheld, where on the Island of North-Beveland his ancestors had reclaimed land before since 1161.

He was born about 1245 and grew up with the work of his father as a continual example before him. When he began to take an active part in it is not certain, but about the year 1275 he was very busy. In 1280 most of the available new lands off that coast had been diked in.

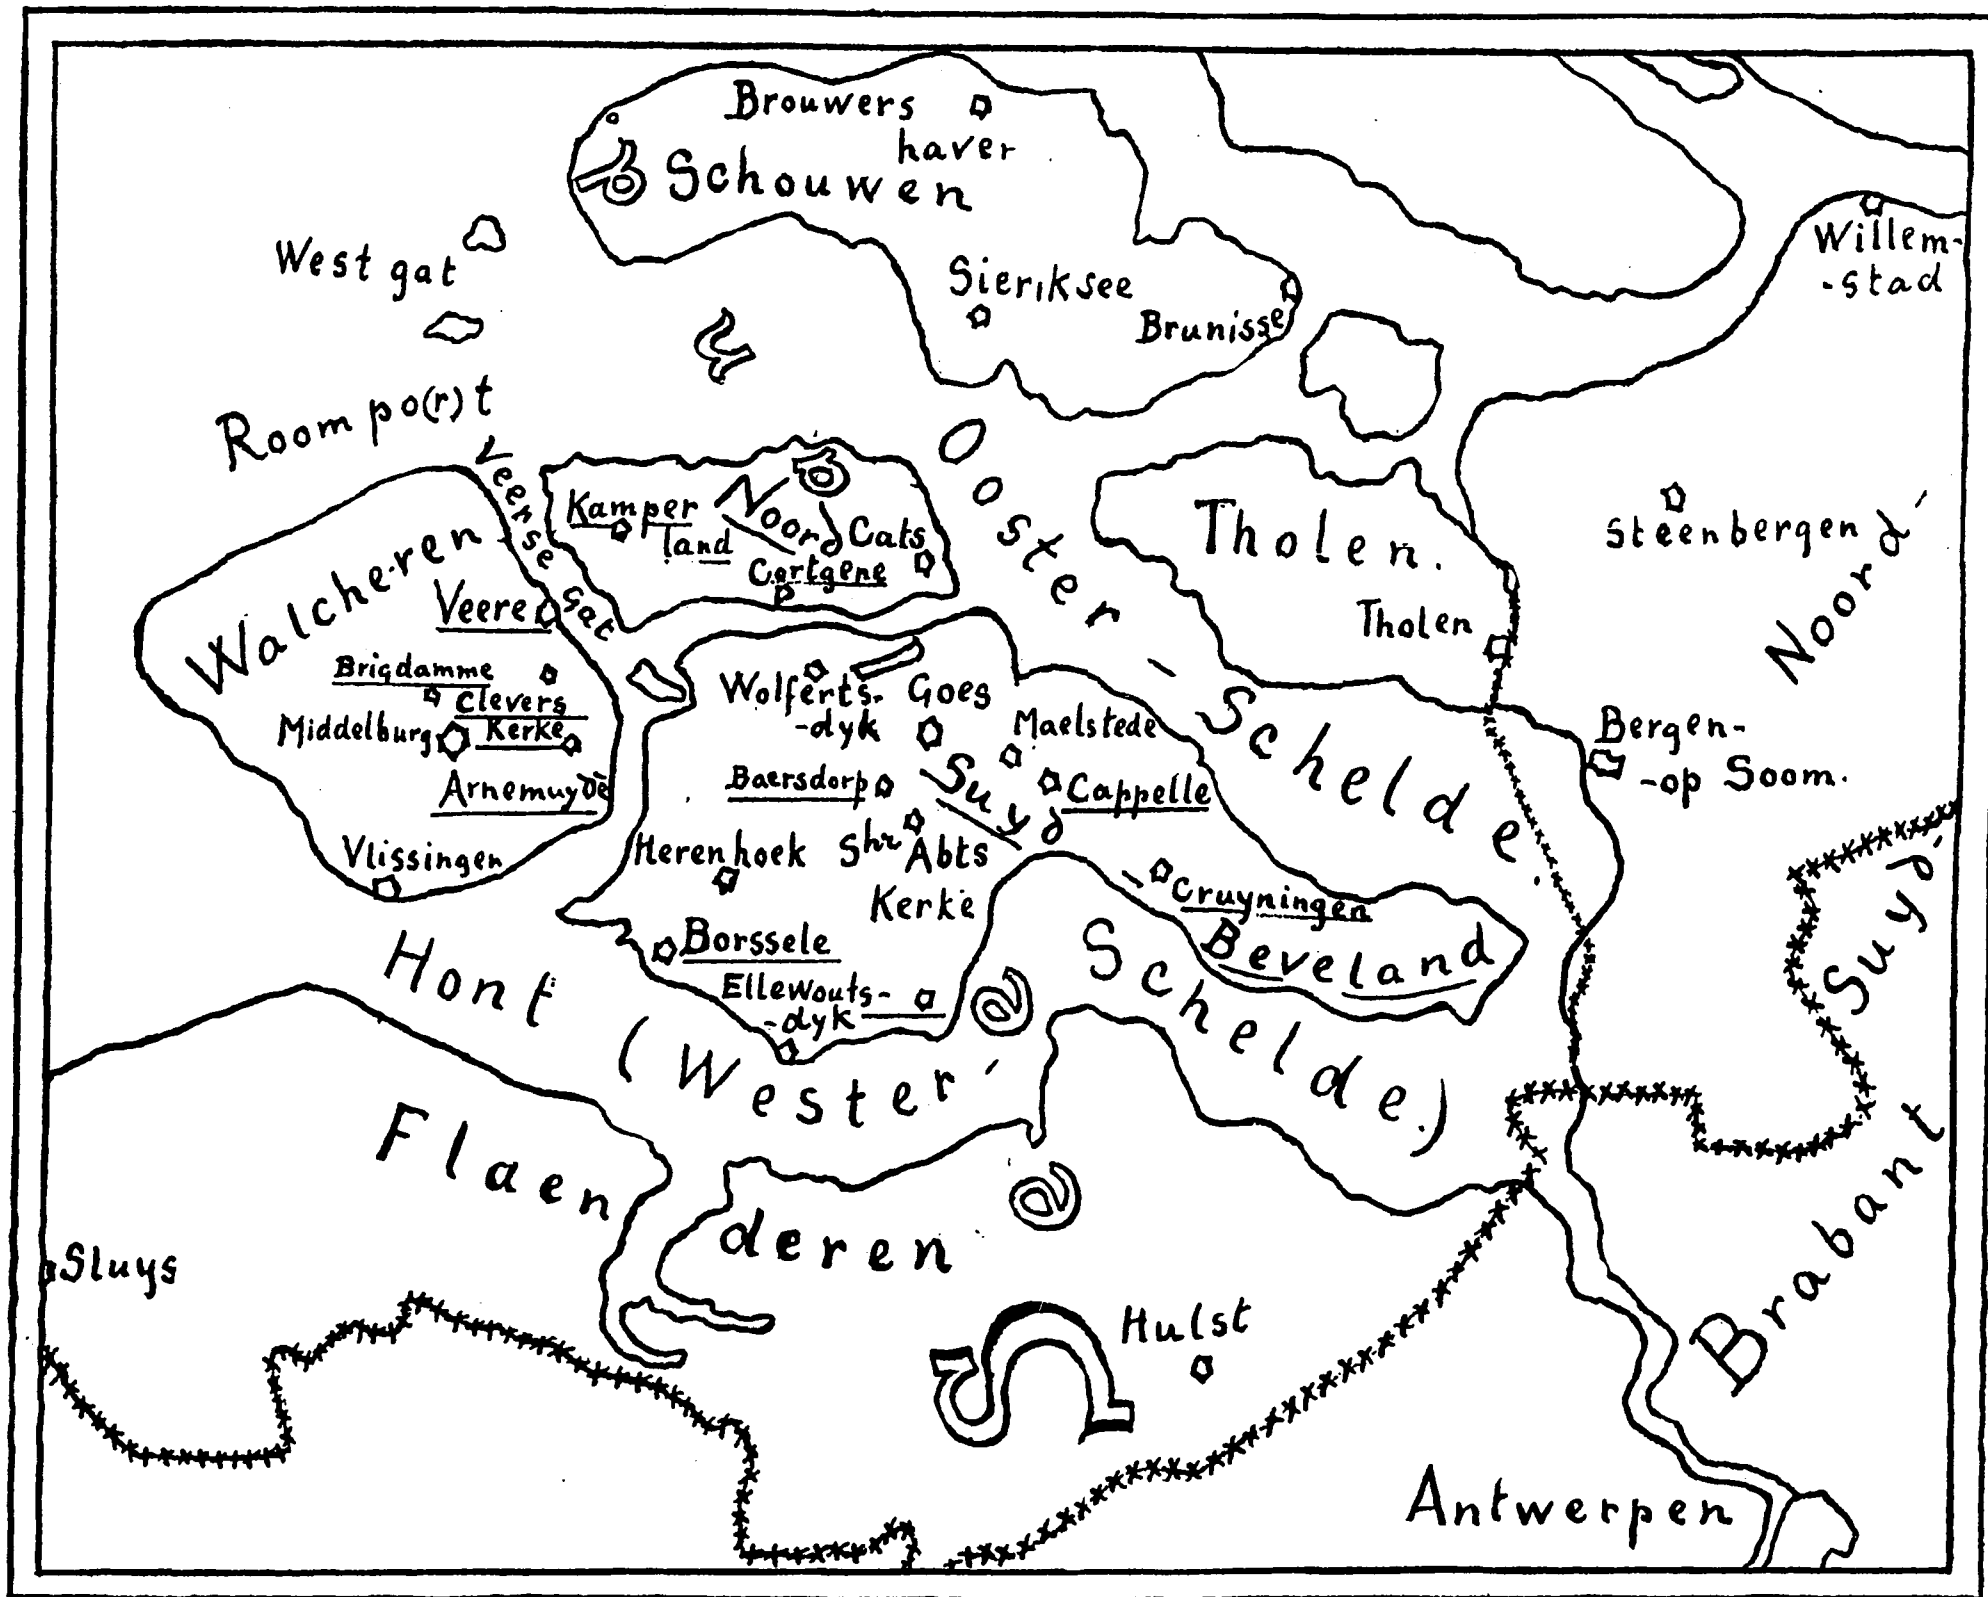

On the presently rediscovered old Roman maps of this ultimate section of the Empire, the Seeland Islands appear yet as a more or less connected portion of the continent, formed by the mud of a number of small rivers behind a growing ridge of sandbanks thrown up by the North Sea.

The Van der Veer Family

The sandbanks then already had become low hills or sand-dunes, where scrubbery grew and numerous sea birds bred. The mud-plates had become meadows, where the Romans, in summer, found the Suavi or Swabians with their cattle. They were a Germanic tribe, who used to swarve over the country; in winter they sheltered in woods and behind mountains and in summer they spend about five months by the seaside. Most of them settled later for good in the present German province Swabia, but many remained and as inhabitants of Seeland are known under the name Sweven or Seeuwen. The Van Borssele's tradition was that their ultimate ancestor was one of the leaders of the Sweven or Swabians.

Since the Northern branch of the Rhine-mouth in Friesland had been laid shallow and finally been stopped up by the formation of the Zuyder sea, the combined throng of Ocean and river water had become too much

MAP OF SEELAND, SHOWING VEERE AND OTHER FAMILY SEATS AND CITIES MENTIONED IN THIS WORK.

DRAWN BY MR. DE BOER.

In the Netherlands

for the spongy new land and in the early middle ages before inhabitants had found out how to make dikes, large parts were washed away, or flooded and compressed below the water surface.

Only the sand-dunes and the more solid parts, to which the vegetation had given some substance, had remained.

The place, "Portum Romanum" or Roman port, had disappeared and the harbor there had widened into a broad inlet at present called "Roompot." This name means in modern Dutch "cream pot," but is in fact a corruption of "Roman-port." Also the flat stretch of meadow land situated near there, and called "Campum" because the Roman legions used to sail from there to Great Britain, had been washed away. The banks there, in Wolfert's times called "de Campen" had risen so far above the sea that sheep could feed there on the grass, except once or twice at high-spring-tide or in winter. Wolfert reclaimed these plots of lands for good by connecting them and surrounding them with strong dikes of clay mixed with sand. This work now was for this section at least completed in 1280. On one of the dikes, the "Sand-dike" Wolfert built in 1281 the castle of Sandenburg. He also built a "Veer" or "Ferry" and a ferry-house to cross from there the Easter Scheld and to connect thereby Walcheren with North-Beveland and his ancestral reclaimed lands there. This ferry he called the "Camper-Veer" or "Ferry of Campum" and soon it became known as "de Veer" or "Veere."

The Van der Veer Family

Whereas the Supreme government had the highest authority over newly reclaimed lands, Wolfert Van Borselen duly notified his sovereign and kinsman, Floris V., of Holland, who was the first Holland Count, whose supremacy over Seeland was not disputed by the Count of Flandres.

On All-Saints day, 12 November, 1282, Count Floris V. thereupon issued a Charter by which Wolfert Van Borssele and his wife, Sibilla, received as a perpetual and hereditary feudality, the new-won land, with all that was built thereon including the Castle and the Ferry, all of which had been gallantly dedicated to Beatrix, wife of Count Floris.

CASTLE SANDENBURG.

In the Netherlands

(See: Frans Van Mieris: Charterboek Van Holland X Seeland." Vol. I, p. 428.) The original document was still existent on St. Boniface Day 1364, when Jan of Blois, Lord of Gouda and Schoonhoven had a copy made of it.

From that time on Wolfert had the title of Lord Van der Veer, Sandenburg and Sanddike. The title of Cleverskercke most probably came to him on ground of matrimonial property. Receiving the sovereignty over the reclaimed lands, Count Floris naturally bound himself to contribute to the extent of the need of the welfare of the whole Island, and the province, to the cost of maintaining and annual fortification of dikes, ferry and harbor. The Count neglected this year after year although his realm had much profit of the new conveniency. Once in 1290 the first Lord Van der Veer invited him kindly to be his guest at Sandenburg and dine with him. About 1295 Veere had developed into a village or small settlement of men who had joined their interests with those of the Lord Van der Veer and placed themselves with their families and goods under his authority and jurisdiction.

The Van der Veer Family

These men and the Lord himself owned then already a number of ships. Some of them, though small, ventured to cross from here to England as the Romans had done before them, when England was still Britain. The commercial success soon made the owners build larger and more appropriate vessels. The weaveries of Flandres were known in those days and needed more wool than their sheep produced and their meadows could not feed more sheep than they did. Commerce over land was long and dear and risky, besides Holland and France, the enemies and neighbors of Flandres, would not furnish them wool at any price. The English and Scotch wool was very much desired and Flemish weavers had not yet crossed to develop the present industry there. Even thirty years later there were few persons of whom could be said, what Geoffrey Chaucer said of "The good wife of Bath": "Cloth weaving she did so well understand, almost as those of Flandres and of Ghent." Veere began to become a wool importing place of influence and the Ist Lord Van der Veer was already a wealthy man twenty years after his success in land reclaiming. He had made the boundary between sea and land sharper. Where was mud before, on which no foot would stand and no wood float, hoisted now stately deep sea vessels, their sails under the walls of a firm and strong based castle.

In the Netherlands

The unlimited free trade of the Seelanders did not please the Count of Holland. Floris V wanted to see strong cities and a well-faring population in his immediate neighborhood. As much as he could he promoted commerce and industry of Haarlem, Leyden and Delft. Where they were in the natural disadvantage he created artificial advantages. Floris protected the wool trade and weaveries of these cities by a high tariff on wool in all his lands. For the Lord Van der Veer this was almost prohibition of his English-Flemish wool-trade.

The Count had made himself thus at once two more mighty enemies, namely Wolfert I Van der Veer and Henry VII of England. In Holland itself were many mighty nobles infuriated against the Count for less noble reasons. He namely had made an end to their highway robberies and piratical enterprises. Combined with these men Wolfert Van der Veer plotted in 1296 to take the Count prisoner and ship him to England, where Henry would bring him to terms in the wool import matter.

The Van der Veer Family

The Holland nobles, however, had a much deeper hate against the Count. The same year they captured him suddenly while hunting and much to the regret of Wolfert Van der Veer they murdered him cruelly at the spot.

Wolfert Van der Veer lived long enough to see the old countal house of Holland die out in 1299 with Jan, only son of Floris, and to see the house of Henault as rulers of Holland.

When the Counts of Holland had not promoted the commerce of Seeland, he had advocated a broad commercial union between England, Flanders and Holland. It was a season of great joy to him to see the Flemish arms defeat the French Knights of Adventure in 1303 and to receive their triumphant fleet in his harbor at Veere in the same year.

In the Netherlands

Here was a prophecy of the great days that were to come for his foundation and his posterity.

Without a blot on his character or a stain of blood on his hand, even in those sharp times, the man who devoted a lifetime to the welfare and progress of his family, his province and finally to those of two great countries, died in the end of the year 1303. Compared with that what was to come his work was only a foundation yet, but a solid and a sound foundation.

Wolfert, Ist Lord Van der Veer, had married Sibilla (lady of Cleverskercke). They had eight children; five sons and three daughters:

Wolfert, the IId Lord Van der Veer who follows.

Floris, Claes, Frank, Hendrick, Hadewich, Sibilla, Margaretha.

The daughters all married. Sibilla died high-aged, last of all in 1352.

After the death of Sibilla Van Cleverskercke, Wolfert, Ist Lord Van der Veer, had married Catharina de Durbuy, widow of

The Van der Veer Family

Albert Van Voorne. She owned the Castle of Teylingen in Holland and in the pleasant surroundings Wolfert spent sometimes a few restful days. In this same castle Wolfert's great grandson, Frank Van Borselen, would once, more than a century afterward cheer the last days of the most unfortunate yet most heroic countess of Holland, Jacoba, who died there in 1436.

With the sons of Wolfert, Ist Lord Van der Veer, the family began to split up into branches again as their Van Borselen ancestors had done before them.

The oldest son continued the Van der Veer line.

The 2nd son, Floris Van Borselen Van der Veer, married, but died childless.

The 3rd son, Claes Van Borselen Van der Veer, became Lord of Brigdamme and founder of the family Van Brigdamme, which died out in 1521 at Gouda with Jacob Van Brigdam. But the line of Raes, 4th son of the aforesaid. Claes, having returned to their old home at Veere continued as the Van Borselen Van Sanddyck.

A great grandson of Raes Van Sanddyck,

In the Netherlands

Adriaen, became through marriage, Lord Van der Hooghe.

His descendants have become the chief and subsequently the only existing direct legitimate branch of the Van Borselen Van der Veer family.

The name at present is fixed at Van Borselen Van der Hooghe.

The 4th son, Frank Van Borselen Van der Veer, became the founder of the family Van Cortgene, which seems to have no traces in history beyond the 16th century.

VI. Wolfert, 2d Lord Van der Veer, was born about 1270. He succeeded his father in all his titles and most of his property in 1303. Under the disturbed conditions in Holland and Flandres the Seeland nobles had deemed it necessary to select a leader. Wolfert Van der Veer was made "First Nobleman of Seeland," a title which was hereditary upon his oldest son and which was conferred to the later Lord of Veere also after the old reigning line had come to an end.

It implied the presidency at the assemblies

The Van der Veer Family

of the Seeland nobles, a decisive vote in dubious questions, and the right to be plenipotentiary of Seeland at all conferences abroad where Seeland interests were pending.

In 1304 the Flemish supremacy so welcome to Seeland, was again and this time for good brought to an end by the Count of Holland, and Holland and Seeland were from that time on united under one sovereign head. William III, who succeeded there in 1304, was the most popular Count Holland ever had. Regular taxations did not exist then, but whenever the Prince was in need of money for his private, as well as his public affairs, he used to appeal to the local representatives in the cities and to the Assembly of nobles.

William III gave so many commercial privileges to the different cities that they, at certain occasions, when he called for money, gave him ten times more than he asked. This made him also very popular at Veere.

Wolfert II died before 1317.

He had been married with Aleida of Henault, a sister of the Count of Holland, William III.

In the Netherlands

Their children were, Wolfert, who became IIIId Lord Van der Veer; Sibilla and Claes.

His widow remarried with Otto Van Buren, as whose widow she died at high age in 1351.

VII. Wolfert, IIIId Lord Van der Veer, succeeded after his father's death in 1317 at the age of twenty-one. He, therefore, must have been born in 1295. For twenty years he ruled Veere and surroundings under the prosperous reign of his sovereign William III of Holland. The ship building at Veere was extended. Not only for own use but for many surrounding places ships were made and a considerable number of trading vessels came there for their regular annual repairs. The wool trade between England and Flandres was greatly carried on by Wolfert III and his men, many of whom had become wealthy themselves. When in 1337 William III, the full first cousin of Wolfert III died, the prosperity lasted under the reign of his son, William IV, or rather of his council. The young count disliked the peace of his father's days and looked for war and trouble everywhere. In 1345 he crossed with a few ships and the best of the knighthood of Holland and Seeland the Zuyder See. He wanted to subdue the Frisians, who had no Lord, but a republic of the so-called "Seven Free Frisian Sealands." The count's army was completely defeated and he himself was slain. He died childless and this was the cause which ended the years of prosperity.

The Van der Veer Family

Willem IV left two sisters: Margaretha, the oldest, who was married with Lodewick of Bavaria, Emperor of the German Empire, and Philippa, the youngest, whose husband was Edward III, king of England. Margaretha succeeded as countess of Holland and Seeland and placed her 2nd son, Willem of Bavaria, there as her lieutenant. He was only seventeen years old, but so ambitious that he refused to give governmental account to his sovereign mother. The two old parties in Holland, the nobility that wanted to live from revenues and the nobility that in combination with the rising cities developed commerce and industry, had been dormant and now woke up again. Dependency of a count from the empress meant more or less dependency from the Empire. The Commercial nobility and the cities were bitterly against it; the "fait rien" nobility wanted a weak and dependent local government under which they could carry out their robberies and piratical enterprises. Wolfert III, in his quality of "First Noble of Seeland," had in the first place to be loyal to the legal sovereign, who was Margaretha. But Margaretha had already at several previous occasions shown her hate for the peaceful and commercial party and favored that of the Knights of Adventure to which the Van Borselen family as a whole, and the commercial and industrial Van der Veer branch especially, was sharply opposed. Willem, her son, promised the commercial party to promote the economical welfare of the country if he was made independent Count of Holland and Seeland. Willem, of Bavaria, seeing the importance of the aid of a man like Wolfert III Van der Veer, whose principles he knew, tried with promises suitable to these principles to gain his friendship and therewith the authority over whole Seeland. By letter of the 14th of January, 1350, he confirmed Wolfert in all his ancestral possessions, in case he, Willem, would become sovereign count, thus securing him the same rights in which he had already been confirmed by Countess Margaretha (see: Van Mieris: Charterboek Van Holland X Seeland, vol. II, p. 766).

In the Netherlands

The Van der Veer Family

But by letter of the 18th of January, 1350, Wolfert and his two uncles still living Claes and Floris Van Borssele Van der Veer as only chief representatives of their house and of the nobility of Seeland swore anew loyalty to Countess Margaretha (see Van Mieris, vol. II, p. 767). If she, instead of the side of the knights of adventure, would take that of the commercial nobility and cities, why should they forswear their legal sovereign? In Seeland were since 1342 no more knights of adventure. The last quarrels had ended there by the settlement of July 23, 1342, by Count Willem IV. At the same date he had nominated a committee which should settle the smaller quarrels which had still remained. This committee, formed by three noblemen:

In the Netherlands

Claes Cervinck, Bolaerd Bolaerds and Wolfert, IIIrd Lord Van der Veer, was presided by the last named. (See Van Mieris, vol. II, pp. 659-61.) The discord among the nobles of Seeland had subsequently entirely disappeared in 1350 when the parasitic knights of the Teutonic order left Veere and Sanddyk.

These knights had been invited by Wolfert, Ist Lord, to colonize his new lands in 1280 and since they had remained there married there and taught their children the traditions of an idle and parasitic life. The commercial and industrial nobility of Seeland therefore stood for the first time as one man when in 1350 they renewed the oath to Countess Margaretha of Holland. The political state of affairs the next following year was laid before a conference of Holland and Seeland nobles and city representatives at Dordrecht (Mar., 1351) at which also Margaretha and her pretending son were present. Wolfert Van der Veer represented the Seeland nobility. There it became so evident that Countess Margaretha had decided to restore in Holland and Seeland the power of the knights of adventure, that those who took the economic welfare of the country at heart immediately decided to abandon her and to proclaim her son as Willem V Count of Holland and Seeland. Wolfert Van der Veer, then giving up all hope upon the public spirit of Countess Margaretha openly forswore her and hailed Willem as sovereign. The whole nobility and population of Seeland applauded his firm action. Margaretha tried to force her country to subduction with the help of her brother-in-law, Edward III, of England. Much against his former politics and against the commercial interests of England he broke then the peace with Seeland and in April, 1351, he sent out a war fleet against his nephew Willem V of Holland. With the III^d Lord Van der Veer's help Willem in the meantime had formed at Veere a small naval power.

The Van der Veer Family

A battle between the two forces took place by the harbor of Veere in May, 1351. Count Willem's forces were thoroughly beaten and Wolfert, III^d Lord Van der Veere, died a most glorious death in the defence of his country against the British invader. (See

CHURCH

THE TOWN HALL

THE CITY OF VEERE, BIRTHPLACE OF THE COMMON ANCESTORS OF THE VANDERVEER FAMILY IN AMERICA.
From an old print.

In the Netherlands

P. J. Blok: Gesch. Van het Nederl. Volk II., pp. 83, 84. Also Hendrick Van Wyn's article in Werken Van het Zeeuwsch Gen. 1837.) The wounded lion of Seeland took revenge of the death of the "First Noble" and in July, 1351, Willem's victorious fleet drove the last Englishman to sea.

Beside the commerce and industry Wolfert III had promoted art and architecture. A new beautiful parochial Church was finished under his auspices at Veere in 1348. (See David Van Hoogshaten. Groot Woordenboek.)

Wolfert III'd Van der Veer, had married Lady Hadewwich, both Van der Eem. (See: Van Wyn.)

Their only two children were:

Wolfert, who became IVth Lord Van der Veer and Aleyt, who married Jan Van Heenvliet, Lord of Blydenstein. She died in 1364. (See J. Kok. Tab. I. Col. 4) leaving children Jan, Elisabeth and Sweris, who married in 1389. There were heirs of Heenvliet. (See Note 4.)

The Van der Veer Family

Generation:

VIII. Wolfert, IVth Lord Van der Veer, born about 1320, succeeded his father in 1351 and shortly thereafter when the Willem V became victorious, peace was restored in Holland and Seeland. Wolfert IV immediately took up the works of peace and the progress of Veere at the point where his father had been forced to leave it. With the help of his father's new built watermills, he continued to make some more conquest on the sea, as his remote ancestry had done already two hundred years before him. (See: Van Mieris. Charterboek II, p. 766. Also: Het Recht Van Zyne Hoogheid op Veere. edit 1745, p. 90.)

The new land he called "de Polder" or "The dried-up pool" and to his titles was added that of Lord Van de Polder. (See: Joh. Kok. Tab. I. col. s.)

He also largely improved the streets of Veere and had wooden houses replaced by stone structures so as to diminish the danger of fires. Since 1350 he had seen the necessity of the fortification of his city.

A strong wall, with towers and bulwarks was built round Veere and finished in 1370. In 1357 Count Willem V had become insane as always was and still is a hereditary evil in the Royal House of Bavaria.

In the Netherlands

His youngest brother, Albrecht, of Bavaria, succeeded him. He was 21 years old when in 1358 he arrived in Holland. Under his reign peace and prosperity again in these lands since the industrial population was left undisturbed. Count Albrecht died in 1404.

Wolfert, IVth Lord Van der Veer, had married Lady Margaretha Van Arnemuyden. From this marriage one son was born in 1345. Hendrick, who as Vth Lord Van der Veer, became his father's successor.

Generation :

IX. Hendrick, Vth Lord Van der Veer, born in 1345, succeeded his father in 1383. He made a special effort to direct also other trades than the English wool trade toward Veere and he also succeeded in extending the wool trade. Almost twenty-five years he governed the city and literature began to flourish there. His citizens spent most of the summertime at sea and in strange countries. In wintertime they stayed at home and the long winter evenings were used in story-telling and making of poetry.

The Van der Veer Family

Three "Camers Van Rethoryken" were established at Veere: "de Witte Lely" (the White Lily); "de Blaue Accolyn" ("The Blue Mistical Flower") and "In Reyner Jonste Groeyende" ("Growing in Pure Friendship").

Hendrick Van der Veer married Catharina Van Ellewoutsdyck, who died after the birth of his only son, Wolfert. He married for the second time with Margaretha Van Nyenrode, who became the mother of two daughters, Catharina and Aleida, Catharina Van der Veer married Allard de Pougues, a French nobleman. Aleida married a Seelander, Arent, Lord Van Cruyningen. Hendrick, Vth Lord Van der Veer, died in the year 1406 after a peaceful and well bestowed life.

Generation:

X. Wolfert, VIth Lord Van der Veer, born in 1372, succeeded his father in 1406. He had to face political difficulties from the beginning. Count Albrecht had died in December, 1404. His son, who had succeeded him as Willem VI, contrary to his father, favored the always dissatisfied party of the Knights of Adventure or "Hooks" as they were called against the welfaring cities and commercial nobility, who went by the name the "Cods" or "Codfishes." The name Cod was given to the followers of Willem V and Albrecht already from their blue and silver checked uniforms, which resembled the scales of fishes. These gave to the knights of Adventure the name of Hooks because they were always hooking and angling for some unearned increases or profits derived from the welfaring industrial population. Wolfert VI was like his fathers and the thoroughly honest Seeland nobility a "Cod." The new Count had to be a "Hook," for he had only one daughter, who he wished to succeed him in Holland and Seeland. She, of course, had to be "Hook" as all female rulers of those days were. If they were not the increasing commercial population would by the least resistance have proclaimed the republic. Now by professing "Hook" prin-principles she secured for herself at least the assistance of the Knights of Adventure. Willem VI, a weak man, who felt that he would not live long, secured in advance this help for his daughter by professing "Hook" principles immediately after his succession in 1405.

In the Netherlands

The Van der Veer Family

The leader of the commercial party in Holland was at that time Lord Jan Van Arkel, like Wolfert VI, was the leader of whole Seeland. Jan Van Arkel refused, in 1405, to swear allegiance to such a Count and the Count with all his "Hooks" opened war on the Cod leader in Holland.

Wolfert VI kept wisely Seeland out of the troubles in Holland. He acknowledged Willem VI, as Count, knowing that the Count could not trouble Seeland much as long as he was engaged in Holland. The Count relying upon a certain commercial jealousy which existed between Holland and Seeland thought he could win Wolfert VI and whole Seeland for the "Hook" party. He bestowed honors upon Wolfert immediately after his succession as VIth Lord Van der Veer in 1406. By charter of 6 November, 1406, he confirmed him in his whole paternal inheritance. (See: Van Mieris. Charterboek IV, p. 39.) But the young scion of such an old and confirmed "Cod" family could not be caught by any sweet bate of the "Hooks."

In the Netherlands

As soon as Wolfert VI saw that the commercial party in Holland was faring badly in the war against the Count fear for the safety of Seeland compelled him to step in and join the forces of Jan Van Arkel. He acted too late; for Willem's troops, who could have been easily defeated by an army joined from the beginning, had thoroughly defeated the chief of the Holland Cods from 1405 to 1410 and their Seeland helpers with the rest of the scrambling army were defeated from 1410 to 1412.

Wolfert VI died probably in this war in the beginning of the year 1411. (See: P. J. Blok. "Gesch" II, pp. 108-9.)

Wolfert VI had married in 1403 with Hadewich Van Borselen, daughter of Claes Van Borselen, Lord Van Brigdamme, who was a great grandson of Wolfert, Ist Lord Van Borselen Van Der Veer.

The Van der Veer Family

In 1411 he left one little son, Hendrick, only six years old.

Generation :

XI. Hendrick, VIIth Lord Van der Veer, born in 1404, succeeded his father in 1411. "Hendrick het Kind" or "Hendrick, the Child" as he was commonly called had for his natural guardians his mother Lady Hadewich and his maternal grandfather Lord Claes Van Brigdamme, who as Regent also had to act as "First Nobleman of Seeland."

Here was a chance for Willem VI to deteriorate the power of a "First Noble of Seeland." As Wolfert VI during his lifetime expected, the Count took strong action in Seeland affairs as soon as he was victorious in Holland. Even before the peace in Holland was concluded in 1412 Count Willem VI who as sovereign had the supreme right of discharging and nominating guardians, discharged Lord Claes and Lady Hadewich from their guardianship of the young Lord Van der Veer. The Count, in nominating guardians, however, was bound by the rule that whenever a guardian was discharged the next in kin to the minor had to be appointed according to the laws of seniority. By manifest of 17 November, 1411, the lawful guardians were removed on accusation of ambitions of the house of Van Borselen Van Brigdamme against the house of Van Borselen Van der Veer. (See Van Mieris: Charterboek. IV, p. 193.) The child's oldest aunt, Catharina Van der Veer, was made guardian instead. The title of "First Noble of Seeland" was now in hands of a woman. And her husband, the foreign Lord Allard de Pouques, as expected, took no interest in Holland and Seeland affairs. Lady Catharina was a warm Seeland patriot sacrificed the honor in favor of the Seeland interest much against the expectation of Count Willem VI. As soon as she had served her minimum legal term as guardian, she returned on 30 November, 1413, the guardianship into the hands of the sovereign count. Her excuse was as open as it could be. She stated that she rather saw the guardianship in hands of a man or of a woman, whose husband, as acting guardian, could better exercise the rights of a guardian of a Lord

In the Netherlands

The Van der Veer Family

Van der Veer. (See: Van Mieris; Charterboek IV, p. 263.) Willem VI knew what would follow next; he hesitated. But he could not escape from acting lawfully. His position in Holland and Seeland, in view of the question of succession was too weak than that he could afford to make even one new enemy. And here such an important one as that of the First Noble man of Seeland was in the scale. Aleida Van der Veer, young Hendrick's other aunt, was the next entitled to the guardianship. Her husband, Arent Van Cruinengen, was a "Cod" and a powerful Seeland nobleman at that. The Advent and the Christmas holidays gave the count a welcome delay. But on the 11th of January, 1414, Arent Van Cruiningen, husband and the child's late aunt, Aleida Van der Veer was directly appointed as guardian. (See Van Meris: Charterboek. IV, p. 264.) He served as such faithfully and as a good educator until Hendrick's majority in 1425. (See also for the relationship: Van Mieris. IV, p. 298.)

Willem VI foreseeing the troubles which his daughter Jacoba might find in her suc-

In the Netherlands

cession had taken all possible steps to prevent this. In the summer of 1416 he called the noblemen and city representatives of all Holland and Seeland up to a meeting at The Hague. There the "Hook" nobility took the oath to Jacoba unconditionally and the commercial nobility together with the cities promised that they would acknowledge Jacoba, if she would take the economical welfare of the country at heart. The Van Borssele and Van Brigdamme were present at the meeting, also the "First Noble of Seeland." There was among others Willem Ist Lord Van Scaghen, illegitimate brother to Count Willem VI of Holland; he swore unconditionally allegiance to his niece Jacoba. (See P. K. Blok. "Gesch." II, pp. 113-16.)

Other securities for the succession were laid by matrimonial connection. When in the end of 1417 Count Willem VI died the succeeding Countess Jacoba fell immediately under "Hook" influence and when the "Cods" chose at once and unanimously her uncle Jan of Bavaria as their head, the old hostilities broke out again, more severe and more complicated than ever before.

The Van der Veer Family

Frank Van Borselen Van Cortgene, grandson of Frank, founder of the Van Cortgene family, 3d son of Wolfert 1st Lord Van der Veer was from the beginning Jan of Bavaria's right hand in Seeland. He was placed in charge of the naval affairs there in 1421. (See Blok. Gesch II, p. 128.)

Jan, of Bavaria, was a priest and bishop of Liege. As such he was not married and had no legitimate heir. He nominated as such his sister Margaretha's son, Philip of Bourgond. From that time on Bourgond forces helped him in Holland and Philip acted as chief of the "Cods" of Holland and Seeland as often as Jan was sick or absent. When on January sixth, 1425, Jan, of Bavaria, died, Philip succeeded him in his leadership and in his expectations in Holland and Seeland.

In the same year Hendrick, VIIth Lord Van der Veer, had reached the age of majority. He was now also acting "First Nobleman of Seeland." Philip, of Bourgond, was as sure of the interests of Seeland in his professed "Cōd" principles, as of his own ambition. By proclamation of 21st March, 1426, he appointed the young Lord Hendrick VII Van der Veer together with his older and more experienced relative Frank Van Borsselen Van Cortgene to Captain-General or what was later called admiral and placed them in chief command of the Seeland navy. They had earned their laurels already for near Browershaven in Seeland the joint fleets of Holland and Seeland under Frank's command had beaten already the English fleet, which then under Humphrey, of Gloucester, third husband of Countess Jacoba, had come to her rescue. (See: Blok: Gesch II, p. 132.) Jacoba, with few helpers, had from 1425 to 1428, gallantly fought her lawful but unjust cause against the overwhelming progressive powers. By the compromise of 3 July, 1428, Philip, of Bourgonde, as "heir expectant" was left in the actual possession of Holland and Seeland and a sort of honorary advisership in matters of government was left to Jacoba, who also kept the title of Countess. The two countries, Holland and Seeland, were exhausted and the once flourishing commerce and industry had suffered so much that the population was impoverished. Philip saw no other means to restore the public finances than by giving the revenues of Holland and Seeland in pawn to some weathy nobleman. The revenues of Holland and Seeland were pawned in November, 1430, for the time of eight years by "Philip, of Bourgond," with consent of Countess Jacoba, to Hendrick, VIIth Lord Van der Veer, Frank Van Borselen Van Cortgene and Floris Van Borselen van Sanddyck. They received the titles of Governors of Holland and Seeland. Doing this they did a great service to Philip, of Bourgond, for the countries were so poor that the pawn was bought much too high. Besides, the Seeland nobles had difficulties in collecting the taxes and revenues in Holland, where the Seelanders, although much richer, were considered as a race subdued to Holland. There were riots whenever collections were made in Holland cities and in 1432 the Governors saw themselves in the necessity to make another arrangement. From that time on they kept themselves accountable for the collections to Philip and this dependency pleased the Hollanders. The Van Borsseleens, however, had not for nothing given themselves these troubles. The extremely favorable circumstances had made them ambitious. Frank Van Cortgene, in August, 1432, had secretly married Countess Jacoba. This union of new actual power with old actual authority might become dangerous for Philip's position in the counties. Before, therefore, anything could be done, he imprisoned, in October, 1432, Frank, and sent him in exile. Then after he had deprived Jacoba of her remainder of authority he recalled her husband. They were allowed to live peacefully at the Castle of Teylingen, where Wolfert, Ist Van der Veer, had spent many a restful day also. Jacoba's very stormy life ended there on 9th October, 1436. Frank van Borssele Van Cortgene lived many years yet as a faithful subject of Philip, of Bourgond.

In the Netherlands

The Van der Veer Family

In the Netherlands

Hendrick, VIIth Lord Van der Veer, strengthened his position in Holland much by the purchase of lands which, through change of sovereigns, had to be evacuated by foreign residents. In 1434 by charter of 10th October, Philip confirmed him in the jurisdiction of all the lands he had bought in Holland. (See Van Mieris. Charterboek IV, pp. 1053 and 1058.)

The Van der Veer Family

In all these public dealings and affairs Hendrick had not neglected his City of Veere. In 1430 he had made ships there for navigation further than England. He had made wool trade connections also with Scotland, for the Flemish cities needed more wool than ever, they had become the clothiers of whole Western Europe.

With Edward IVth, of England, and James Ist, of Scotland, Hendrick, VIIth Lord Van der Veer, made a free trade union. Export and import in each other's lands and ports should be completely free. Only if other merchants than those of Veere imported wool or sheepskins there from England and Scotland they had to pay 3 "groot" import duty per pound. This last clause secured the Lords Van der Veer the wool trade to remain in their own hands.

At this time the Scotch wool staple, or principal continental storehouse for superflu-

In the Netherlands

ously imported Scotch wool, at the request of Hendrick, was transferred from Brugges to Veere by the King of Scotland.

The splendor of the house Van der Veer reached its summit when the Scotch King, in 1444, gave his daughter Maria Stuart in matrimony to Wolfert, son of Lord Hendrick Van der Veer.

In 1435 Hendrick had opened commercial connections with the Baltic lands and the Scandinavian countries. The first ships from Norway were seen in the harbor of Veere that year. When Hendrick, VIIth Lord Van der Veer, admiral of Holland and Seeland, First noble of Seeland died in 1472, he left his office in splendid condition, his city in prosperity and his family in wealth and in the first ranks with the kings of Europe. (See David van Hoogstraten and all the Seeland Chronicles.) Hendrick, VIIth Lord Van der Veer, had married Lady Janne Van Halewyn, Lady of Hemsrode, who gave him one son, Wolfert, who would succeed his father as IXth Lord Van der Veer. Hendrick also left two other sons, Paulus and Wolfert Van der Veer, whose grandson

The Van der Veer Family

Cornelis Van der Veer has become the ancestor of Cornelis Jansen Van der Veer, the New Netherland immigrant. (See under XII.)

Generation:

XIIa. Wolphert, VIIIth Lord Van der Veer, born in 1428, succeeded his father in 1474. As a young lad he had already married Maria Stuart, daughter of the King of Scotland, in 1444. One child, Charles (Karel), was born from this marriage, but child and mother died soon thereafter. At a riper age, about 1465, he remarried with a French lady, Charlotte de Montpensier. Three daughters were left by her: Margaretha, who died as a child; Anna Van der Veer, who became her father's successor, and Margaretha van der Veer, who married Walrave Van Brederode.

When Wolfert, VIIIth Lord died in 1487 as the last Lord Van der Veer of the old house, he saw the trade of the city extended over the whole then known world. Products of the North pole lands were imported in Veere from the Baltic, and tropical products from Spain and the Canerian Island, where ships of Veere were seen few years before Columbus passed them on his way to a new world.

THE TOWN HALL OF VEERE, ERECTED 1470-1474

In the Netherlands

Generation:

XIIIa. Anna Van Borsselen Van der Veer was the last ruler of Veere of the old house, married Philip, of Bourgond, an illegitimate son of Count Philips, to whom she had married in 1466 a year before his father's death. On their heirs and descendants the titles of Lord Van der Veer, admiral of Holland and Seeland and First Nobleman of Seeland would be conferred and after them to all who might legally possess the city and land of Veere.

The passing away of the old house as rulers of Veere was marked by large calamities for the city. In 1510 there was a heavy fire in the Northern section of the town; besides many storehouses and salt factories, twenty residences of wealthy merchants with their art collections were burned. The pest or black death visited Veere in 1518 and took many of the best people away.

The Van der Veer Family

The further history of Veere has to be narrated shortly. Adolf, of Bourgond, became Lord of Veere after his mother Anna's death.

Under his grandson Maximilian, of Bourgond, Emperor Charles V, of the German Empire, made Veere with the surrounding land a marquisy in 1555. The silver cup given to the city by this Lord in February, 1551, was long thereafter used by every election of city magistrates. Having no children, his sister Anna's son, Maximilian, of Henin, got the marquisy after his uncle's death. The young man, who lived abroad and was a spendthrift, sold Veere in 1567 so as to pay some of his enormous debt. The feudal power had shrunk already in those days and in fact he sold not more than a few rights upon offices and certain taxes and other incomes. Philip II, King of Spain, and well-known tyrant Count of Holland and Lord of the other Netherlands bought the city from him.

When after forswearing of the tyrant in 1581 the States-General of the United Netherlands sold the confiscated goods they gave the right of pre-emption to Willem the Silent, prince of Orange.

In the Netherlands

He bought Veere for 146,000 florins.

After the death of his great grandson Willem III Stadholder of the Netherlands, King of England in 1702 by the division of his goods, rights and titles, the price elect of Prussia Frederick III and after him Frederick Wilhelm as I and Frederick the Great became Marquis of Veere.

By the restoration of the house of Orange in the Netherland the Frisian prince Willem IV, of Orange, reclaimed his ancestor's rights on Veere and an agreement was made with Frederick the Great in 1745 by which the marquisy was rendered to him. His son Willem V lost again all his personal land property in the Netherlands in 1795 and by the restoration in 1815 the old titles were merely revived as "private titles of the sovereign" later of "the constitutional King." Queen Wilhelmina is at present "Lady Van der Veer."

In the times of hereditary succession in rulership and government it was very often the policy of the rulers to marry a daughter of another ruler and to procreate if possible only one son, so as to avoid hereditary complications. For the rest they did as they pleased. It was no disgrace to have illegitimate children; they were loved and treated with as much paternal care as the other ones and the question what to do with them did not trouble the father. Seldom they were neglected and in most cases they became prominent citizens. The daughters were usually married to men of some lower social standing, who were very much glorified by the relation to the lord; the sons were usually placed in some public office or magistrature.

The Van der Veer Family

Paulus Van der Veer was made supreme judge of Veere and its jurisdiction by his father Hendrick, VIIth Lord Van der Veer. He was an eminent and able man, who married a lady of nobility and left a posterity to be proud of.

Generation:

XII. Wolfert, third son of Hendrick, VIIth Lord Van der Veer, born in 1435, when his father was in his most glorious and enterprising period, received from his father large estates in Seeland when he became of age.

In the Netherlands

He married a few years later, probably in 1460 with Jacoba Van der Capelle, daughter of Joost, Lord Van der Capelle. Through his governing capacities he was appointed also a burgomaster of the City of Axel in Seeland.

One son, Wolfert Van der Veer was born to him in 1462.

Generation :

XIII. Wolfert Van der Veer, born in 1462, became lord of Spreeuwen-steyn. He married Margaretha van Cruyningen, daughter of a member of the noble Seeland family. This marriage was blessed with one daughter. Wolfert married after his first wife's death with Martina van Borselen Van der Hooghe, a direct descendant of Wolfert Van Borselen, Ist Lord Van der Veer. His brother-in-law, Adriaen Van Borselen Van der Hooghe, a wealthy man, knowing Wolfert's descent gave him on the 14th day of February, 1519, the lordly manor of Spreeuwensteyn. Wolfert was now admitted to the nobility of Seeland. On ground of this Wolfert became electable to the senate of Seeland and as a senator he died.

The Van der Veer Family

From the second marriage two sons were left: Adolph and Wolfert Van der Veer.

Besides he left one other son: Cornelis Van der Veer. (See under XIV.)

Martina's father, Joost Van Borsselen Van der Hooghe, as a widower, had married Josina, lady of Scaghen a large lordly estate and castle near Alkmaar in North Holland or West-Friesland.

In 1492 he lived with his wife at the castle of Scaghen for in that year according to the Charterboek of Holland, he petitioned the bishop of Utrecht that the churches in his jurisdiction should be freed from taxes. This was a political marriage for Wolfert VIII, Lord Van der Veer with other noblemen had conquered the castle of Scaghen in 1477 when Josina Van Scaghen's father quarreled about the possession with his half-brother. Wolfert Van der Veer had decided the succession in favor of Lady Josina, the only daughter of Albrecht Van Scaghen. She was a childless young widow and Wolfert meant to secure by the marriage of her and his relative Joost, the inheritance for the house Van Borssele. But Joost Van Borssele Van der Hooghe died in 1505 and when Josina Van Scaghen died in 1524, the lordship of Scaghen went to her nephew Jan Van Scaghen.

CASTLE SCAGHEN AT THE PRESENT TIME.

In the Netherlands

NOTE: Members of the Van Scaghen family and of the Van der Hooghe branch of the Van Borssele family were about 1630 directors of the West India Company. (See: Joh. de Laet: "Dag Verhael" and O'Callaghan: "Hist. of New Netherland" I. appendix.)

The Van Borsseles in the meantime had got a foothold round Alkmaar and the rich property of Scaghen. (See: Chronicles of the Utrecht Society of History II, 1846, p. 99.)

Anna van Borssele married there with Christoffel Van Scaghen. She was a granddaughter of Joost Van Borssele and the bridegroom was a son of Jan who, in 1524, had become Lord of Scaghen. Her aunt, Martine Van Borssele, wife of Wolfert Van der Veer, Lord of Spreeuwensteyn, saw here a good opportunity for her husband's son Cornelis.

The Van der Veer Family

XIV. Cornelis Van der Veer went to Alkmaar and married there in 1527 Maria Van Scaghen daughter of Jan Van Scaghen. (See Joh. Kok. Tab. I col. 6 and Tab. II col. 5; also Tab. I col. 7.)

Of this marriage at least two sons are known, Jan Van der Veer, born in 1528, and Christoffel Van der Veer, born about 1530.

XV. Of Jan Van der Veer nothing further is known, but his son:

XVI. Christoffel Janszen Van der Veer married on 21st February, 1590, with Catharina Jans Van Deventer. (See Marriage register of Schoonhoven.)

Christoffel Janszen Van der Veer and Catharina Jans Van Deventer had the following children:

Cornelis Van der Veer,
Jan Van der Veer,

In the Netherlands

Anna Van der Veer,
Hendrick Van der Veer,
Pieter Van der Veer, and
Maria Van der Veer.

Generation:

XVIIa. Cornelis Van der Veer, born 1592, went to Amsterdam and became a book-printer and publisher there. He married with Cornelia Cornelis, born in 1600. She died in 1662. Their children were among others: (some records say seventeen) Pieter Van der Veer, born at Amsterdam in 1635. Cornelia Van der Veer, born there on August 30, 1639.

XVIIIa. This Pieter Corneliszen Van der Veer is considered to have become the first American ancestor of the Van der Veer family of Beverwyk or Albany, New York. The property still owned by them on Pearl Street in that city was bought by him in October, 1663.

His sister, Cornelia Van der Veer, was a student of literature and a poetess. Her poems show the remarkable interest she took in Dutch foreign political affairs. New

The Van der Veer Family

Netherlands affairs especially interested her. In 1666, two years after the capture of New Netherland, she wrote a satirical poem entitled: "The Reformed Battle-Sword or the Clergy's Complaint about the sad Condition of Our National Navy."

In 1673 when New Netherland was recaptured by the Dutch admirals Evertszen and Binckes, she wrote:

"A Cry of Triumph over the Victory of our Navy."

And the next year at the time of the peace of Westminster there appeared from her hand: "An Olive branch on the Peace concluded with the King of Great-Britain."

Certainly from the spirit of her poems can be seen that the traditions of their ancestors, the hereditary admirals of Holland and Seeland, were still very vivid in the family. Her motto was: "Ick Tracht Veerder!" or "I Try Further!" a worthy motto to be added to the Van der Veer arms and which is especially distinctive for the Albany branch of the family.

CASTLE SCAGHEN—From an old print.

In the Netherlands

XVII. Jan Van der Veer and Anna Van der Veer, her uncle and aunt had "tried further" also in the meantime. Before the birth of their niece they were already at Recife in Brazil, where since 1632 the Dutch colony had begun to flourish. Their sister, Maria Van der Veer, seems to have followed them there very soon, but she stayed for some time at Pernambuco. The baptismal records of the Dutch Reformed Church unfortunately only exist in a fragmentary manuscript. From these fragments the following data could be gathered in regard to the Van der Veer family:

Jan Christoffelsen Van der Veer and his wife, Marie Nickelsen had a child Margaretha, baptised there on the 5th of February, 1644. The aunt, Maria Van der Veer, was baptismal witness.

Jan van der Veer himself had already appeared in the records as a baptismal witness there on April 16, 1642, and his sister, Anna, on August 11, 1641.

Where his son, Cornelis, was born or baptized remains still unsolved, but there seems to have been another son, Hendrick, so that we know at least of Jan Christoffelszen Van der Veer, and Maria Nickelsen, the following children:

The Van der Veer Family

Cornelis Van der Veer,
Hendrick Van der Veer, and Margaretha Van der Veer.

The family returned from Brazil to Holland in 1654 after the colony had been evacuated for the Portugese.

At Alkmaar, in West Friesland or North-Holland, the last possessor of the Castle and lands of Scaghen had died and in 1658 the property was sold for the behoof of the lawful heirs.

Jan Christoffelsen Van der Veer, as grandson of Maria Van Scaghen, received together with the other numerous heirs, his portion of the proceedings of the sale. His son, Hendrick Van der Veer, opened in the same year a book-printery in The Hague.

XVIII. Cornelis Janszens Van der Veer went to New Netherland the next following year and became there the first American ancestor of the Long Island branch of the Van der Veer family.

SCAGHEN TO-DAY.

In the Netherlands

The descendants of Cornelis Christoffelsen Van der Veer and those of his nephew, Hendrick Janszen Van der Veer, seem to have been quite successful as book-printers at Amsterdam and The Hague.

Cornelis Van der Veer, a descendant of the first, had a flourishing business on the Beurs Street at Amsterdam in 1765, which was continued by his widow and sons in 1772.

Pieter Hendricks Van der Veer, nephew of Cornelis Janszen Van der Veer, was book-printer at Rotterdam from 1689 to 1713.

His son, Willem Van der Veer, continued the business there from 1713 to 1730 and descendants of these:

Cornelis, Gerrit and Pieter Van der Veer were book-printers there in 1782.

A son of Gerrit Van der Veer continued his father's business at Rotterdam in 1784.

The Van der Veer family is still numerous and prosperous in Holland and Seeland at present.

The Van der Veer Family

APPENDIX I

Armoiries de la famille Van der Veer :

Van der Veer : (Sélande, Hollande (Alckmaer)

Amerique, (Albany, N. Y., Long Island, N. Y.)

d'argent à un tréfle tige de genelles accompagné de frois arbres arrachés de simple.

Casque couronné d'or

Crête : un tête-de-loup d'or

Lambraquins d'argent et de geuelles.

Pour se distinguer de la branche de Long Island, celle d'Albany est intitulé d'avoir pour sa devise : "Ick Tracht Veerder!"

From a painting by Mr. De Boer

ARMS OF THE VAN DER VEER AND VAN SCAGHEN FAMILIES.

In the Netherlands

APPENDIX II

Direct male Line of Pieter Corneliszen Van der Veer and of Cornelis Janszen Van der Veer, American progenitors.

- I. Floris VIII Van Borssele.
- II. Wolfert IX Van Borssele and (N) Van der Goude.
- III. Frank X Van Borssele, whose 2nd son was:
- IV. Frank Van Borssele and Maria Van Egmond.
- V. Wolfert Van Borssele, I Van der Veer and Sibilla (Van Cleverskercke).
- VI. Wolfert II Van der Veer and Aleida of Henault.
- VII. Wolfert III Van der Veer and Hadewich Both Van der Eem.
- VIII. Wolfert IV Van der Veer and Margaretha Van Arnemuyden.
- IX. Henderick V Van der Veer and Catharina Van Ellewoutsdyck.

The Van der Veer Family

- X. Wolfert VI Van der Veer and Hadewich van Borssele.
- XI. Hendrick VII Van der Veer, whose son was:
- XII. Wolfert Van der Veer and Jacoba Van der Capelle.
- XIII. Wolfert Van der Veere and Margaretha van Cruyningen, whose son was:
- XIV. Cornelis Van der Veer and Maria Van Scaghen.
- XV. Jan Van der Veer.
- XVI. Christoffel Van der Veer and Catharina Van Deventer.
- XVII. Jan Van der Veer and Maria Nickelsen.
- XVIII. Cornelis Van der Veer and Cornelia Cornelis.
- XVIIa. Cornelis Van der Veer, of Flatbush, L. I.
- XVIIIa. Pieter Van der Veer, of Albany, N. Y.